In summary, I find it hard to believe that a project with only questionable economic benefits, dependent on uncertain international cooperation, and potentially harmful to the environment is, in any sense, the best use of tax dollars.

A MIDSEASON COMPROMISE

At one point during the arduous debate that pursued on winter navigation since the committee bill became public in July 1983, several "mid-season" compromises were discussed.

The proposed compromises sought some formula that would allow a navigation extension technically short or a "full season" extension.

As the following editorial from the Detroit Free Press makes clear, the "mid-season" extension proposals were not a viable compromise.

[From the Detroit Free Press, Oct. 14, 1983]

WINTER SHIPPING: PUT A COSTLY, RISKY PROPOSAL BACK ON ICE

Since the proposal for winter navigation was exhumed late last summer in Congress, concerned groups from sportsmen to shippers have risen up to oppose it. The economics of the project against it, as well, but unfortunately that is no guarantee authorization for year-round shipping will be striken from the public works bill now before Congress.

The opposition to winter navigation has been strong enough, however, that two so-called compromises are being discussed. The first would leave it to the Corps of Engineers to decide if the economics and the environmental risk justified 12-month shipping. That's an abdication of congressional responsibility, a backhanded way to slip a $1 billion project to the taxpayers without anyone in Congress being held to account for it.

The second "compromise" would authorize a shipping season to Jan. 31, plus or minus two weeks, which would keep the icebreakers going until the middle of February, little more than a month before shipping generally resumes for the spring. At the moment, that is tantamount to year-round shipping, since the Soo locks have to be closed a month every winter for maintenance, anyway. (For true 12-month shipping, the Soo would probably have to be rebuilt. And Canada would have to be coaxed into spending several hundred million dollars for its share of the work in the St. Clair, Detroit and St. Lawrence Rivers, or the United States would have to pick up those costs, too. That part of the winter shipping bill is not included in the estimates offered by its enthusiasts, however).

An 11-month season would still require several hundred million dollars worth of bubblers, ice booms and icebreakers—everything except the dams and gates at the head of the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers. Since the "compromise" language also invites the Corps to consider any further measures that might be necessary, you can bet a ton of taconite pellets that in a very short time those dams and gates will be under construction, as well.

The major argument for year-round shipping is to allow U.S. Steel to continue shipping its taconite pellets down the Lakes from Duluth to the Lake Erie ports and steel mills. Other shippers have been tepid to the proposal. Studies in the late 1970s found only marginal economic benefits from an extended shipping season.

Since then, the Lakes regional economy has undergone a wrenching change that probably makes 11- or 12-month shipping even less justified. Steel is in decline, the auto industry is adjusting its buying habits, wheat growers ahve turned to Mississippi barges and deregulated rail lines to carry their grain. Meanwhile, nobody has adequately determined the environmental effects of 11- or 12-month shipping—the scouring of the fish feeding grounds beneath the ice, the damage to coastal wetlands and waterfowl habitat, the risk of an oil or chemical spill under ice, the visual impact of the compensating works at the head of the Detroit River or the disruption of some of the best fishing areas in the Lakes.

So, far, a handful of Michigan congressmen have been active in the fight to stave off year-round shipping. Rep. David Bonior, D-Mt. Clemens, has sponsored an amendment to delete winter shipping from the public works bill. Reps. Dennis Hertel, D-Detroit and Robert Davis, R-Gaylord, are conducting hearings on winter navigation at 2 p.m. Friday in the Federal Court building, 231 W. Lafayette, Detroit, and at 9 a.m. Saturday in the Lake Superior State College auditorium in Sault Ste. Marie. The message they should take back to their colleagues in Congress is that Michigan wants to put winter navigation and any illusory compromises permanently back on ice.

COMPROMISE ADOPTED

In the end, a compromise was agreed upon. In a meeting between some members of the committee and several members opposed to section 1123, consensus was reached to strike all references to winter navigation. In the end, H.R. 3678 moves to the floor of the House authorizing no money for winter navigation. It references no provision to extend the shipping season of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Seaway in any manner nor for any length of time.

Instead, it was agreed to authorize a marketing strategy for the Great Lakes region. The bill creates the Great Lakes Commodities Marketing Board to conduct the study.

Specifically, "The Board shall develop a strategy to improve the capacity of the Great Lakes region to produce, market, and transport commodities in a timely manner and to maximize the efficiency and benefits of marketing products produced in the Great Lakes region and products shipped through the Great Lakes."

The compromise language has defined the Board's mandate with some care. The Board is asked to consider a broad range of alternative ways to improve shipping on America's "fourth seacoast." Importantly, nowhere is the Board asked to study any navigation extension.

I support the creation of this Board. I believe the Great Lakes region has been seriously hurt by the economic conditions of the past several years. The energy crisis, followed by rising energy costs, and high interest rates that have prevailed for the past several years, have had greater impact on the agricultural, mining and smokestack industries of the Great Lakes region than they have had on other segments of this nation's diverse economy. The Board has the potential to help identify methods for regional economic revitalization.

The compromise also develops an international advisory group "(A) to develop a bilateral program for improving navigation, through a coordinated strategy on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence Seaway, and (B) to conduct investigations on a continuing basis and make recommendations for a systemwide navigation improvement program to facilitate optimum use of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence Seaway."

Finally, the compromise mandates " * * * a review of the environmental, economic and social impacts of navigation in the U.S. portion of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence System."

This review should not be construed to supplant the need for predictive environmental analysis in previous, existing or proposed projects on the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Seaway that otherwise would require predictive environmental assessments.

The review is an opportunity to catalog and assess the information and data available on the environmental, economic and social impacts of navigation on the lakes. Furthermore, it is an opportunity to determine what data is lacking to fully understand the impact of navigation in the basin.

Importantly, the proposed review provides authority for new, predictive environmental studies where necessary to ensure an accurate and full understanding of the impact of any proposed navigation improvements.

In an effort to fully utilize the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Seaway for its economic and commercial potential, it is vital to minimize adverse effects of these uses upon the environmental and social attributes of the lake system. In attempting to facilitate this, Congress has established its concern that the environmental, economic and social attributes of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Seaway be able to work synergistically to the benefit of the region, its people, and its resources.

In summary, I would like to praise the Public Works Committee for deciding, in the end, to delete winter navigation from their omnibus water bill of 1983. I am pleased that the group established in place of the original section 1123 is not established to study winter navigation. I believe the congressional intent for the Board, to study the potential of Great Lakes navigation during the existing season, is constructive for the region and the Nation.

While the agenda for the Board is ambitious, it establishes an exciting break with the past. For the first time in the debate over winter navigation, the economic, environmental, and social costs of this project have been established as the ground rules for future and further debate. Even more importantly, the debate over winter navigation has been set aside, along with the project. In the process these very same ground rules have been established as vital to the development of commerce in the region.

I am excited by the potential for the Board's study because it can address the true commercial needs of the region while realizing environmental, sociological, and economic constraints of development.

We all realize that we face an era of fiscal restraint. The Nation's vital navigation and water resource projects will be no exception. Regarding a full season extension on the Great Lakes, hundreds of millions of dollars in capital costs alone would be required. We must be certain that the project not only makes sense in its own terms, but is competitive with other potential uses of scarce resources.

I hope this is a final statement on winter navigation for some time to come. I have outlined some of the reasons I have actively opposed this Corps of Engineers project since I first came to Congress in 1977. I believe the cost of winter navigation is exorbitant, and the environmental consequences too severe, as well as poorly documented, for Congress to authorize winter navigation at this time.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we now could deal a little bit with the timeframe, because we have been on this for an hour and a half, and we do not want to curtail anyone speaking. Do we know how many more Members want to be heard?

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would yield, I would suggest that we could probably do it in 30 minutes equally divided, 15 minutes for the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] and 15 minutes for the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER]. By dividing up the time I think we could probably cover the speakers who wish to speak.

Mr. ROE. I would have no objection to that.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate conclude at 5:30 and the time be equally divided between Mr. SNYDER and Mr. HOPKINS.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] yield?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I think the debate has been helpful. I think Mr. HOPKINS has had a chance to express very articulately his concern about a project which is in Mr. SNYDER's district but which has a great impact in Mr. HOPKIN's district.

I think Mr. HOPKINS also articulated the concern that he has that all that he is doing with his amendment is asking us to have a 25-percent cost sharing for this project which is the same policy initiative that we have for all of the other projects in the legislation.

I am concerned, as I read the language that was included in the bill by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER] that this project with a marginal cost benefit ratio of 0.6, not only has a 100-percent Federal contribution, but we go a step further. That is, we have a sentence written in the law that says with respect to each such project:

> Congress finds finds that the benefits determined in accordance with this section 209 of the Flood Control Act of 1970, and attributable to flood measures authorized for such a project, and here are the key words, "exceed the cost of such measures."

What we are doing with that sentence in the law is we are saying because we could not get a 1-to-1 cost-benefit ratio, and because under the original flood protection rules, we do not fund these large flood construction projects unless the costs are retrieved by the benefits, therefore, we, as Congress, wave a magic wand and say that in this case, even though on the financial end it does not meet a 1-to-1 ratio, we are going to automatically say it does.

So I would urge my colleagues to support the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] on the merits of his amendment. He simply wants fairness and justice. Some opportunity for State involvement with lands and easements and rights-of-way with a local contribution that could come from State government if they were for the project. It could come from the State legislature if it was for the project. It could come from the many people who have written to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER]. If they really want the project, they could come up with that 25 percent of the cost.

I think the gentleman from Kentucky has a good amendment, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLINGER].

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The effect, if not the intent, of the gentleman's amendment, would be to kill the Falmouth Dam project. And that, in my judgment, would be a tragic mistake.

The authorization for this project has been on the books for a very long time. It was first authorized as a single-purpose flood control project. Flood damage prevention benefits were needed when the project was first authorized, and they are needed today. The history of the area has been one of too much water or too little. Falmouth braces itself almost annually for flooding from the Licking River, and that is the kind of annual event a community—and especially a rural community struggling economically—can do without.

I represent many small rural communities like those in the Licking Valley, and I know all too well that with a smaller economic base than the national and perhaps even the State norm, small cities and towns in largely rural areas can ill-afford the economic hardship and population outmigration that a relentless pattern of natural disasters can bring.

Under such circumstances, a very worthwhile and perhaps desperately needed project can become marginally feasible. Such is the case, I think it is agreed with the Falmouth Dam project. Falmouth is not located in a high cost area; there are many, many communities in this country where that is the case, and therefore, is being penalized by what would be a too strict application of the Corps of Engineers' project evaluation and selection process.

After a period of the time in the inactive category, the project was found by the corps to be economically justified for its flood control and recreational value and reclassified into the "active" category in 1969. The development of Falmouth Lake, as a flood control and recreation project, was also determined to be the best alternative in a report submitted to Congress in 1972. However, 7 years later, the corps concluded that as a combined flood control and recreational project, it would be only marginally feasible at the then 6⅞-percent interest rate.

Clearly the years of flooding and drought have taken their toll on the Falmouth area, and for the corps to ignore that fact in its project selection procedures would be to discriminate against this rural area facing economic decline.

Ample precedent exists for an exception under such circumstances, and this critically needed project is infinitely deserving of just such consideration. The Falmouth Dam will provide flood control, water supply, economic redevelopment, and substantial employment as part of the construction and recreational development expected. We could not ask much more from an expenditure of public funds.

The reluctance of the Commonwealth of Kentucky to assume its share of the costs of the recreational aspects of this project certainly does not negate the flood control potential of the project, and it should not mean the termination of the project. And it need not, if the language in H.R. 3678, as reported, is retained.

The cost-sharing requirement that the gentleman would impose on this project cannot be satisfied, and thus, his amendment would have the same effect as striking the authorizing provision, which actually remedies the cost-sharing problem by authorizing full Federal funding of the project's construction.

So, speaking as a Representative of a rural area, I can be very sympathetic with the problem faced by the gentleman from Kentucky in having a very definite and strong and demonstrated need, but because of the rigid application of the corps' formulas, not being able to meet that formula and, therefore, being penalized.

So I would urge defeat of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Hopkins amendment regarding the proposed Falmouth Dam project in Pendleton County, KY. I would first like to commend Mr. ROE for including the cost-sharing requirements in this bill. By including these requirements in the bill, the subcommittee has made a step in the direction of fiscal prudence and the rational selection of water projects. I would also like to commend Mr. HOPKINS for offering his amendment. I believe this amendment is consistent with these cost-sharing requirements and deserves our support for the same reasons.

Very simply, the Hopkins amendment asks that the Falmouth Dam project authorized in this bill meet the same standards as all of the other projects in this bill. The amendment requires that local beneficiaries comply with current law and pay for half of the project's recreation features. The amendment also requires them to comply with provisions in this bill and pay one quarter of the project's flood control costs.

As currently written, the bill's language states that Congress finds that the benefits of this project exceed the costs. In fact, this project has a negative benefit/cost ratio. According to the most recent Army Corps of Engineers study, which used the current 8⅛ percent current Federal interest rate, the project would cost $165 million and return 60 cents of benefits for each dollar spent. Since this project was first authorized in 1936, $1 million has been spent to study the project, and still the corps cannot justify this expense.

My second concern is language in the bill which declares that the Falmouth Dam project shall be constructed at full Federal expense. In addition to violating current law requiring a 50-percent cost share for recreation projects, this language violates other provisions in this bill requiring cost sharing for flood control projects. If local beneficiaries of other projects in other States must pay their fair share for their water projects, why shouldn't the beneficiaries of this project put up the appropriate share of its cost?

In reality, this project is opposed by the Governor of Kentucky, the senior Senator from Kentucky, the Kentucky Legislature, the Kentucky Senate, the Kentucky Farm Bureau and several taxpayer and environmental organizations. I don't know any reason why the U.S. House of Representatives should support this project.

Mr. BEDELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I realize the time is late. In fact, I have already missed one flight back to my district and had to cancel the flight back, but I think that it is important that we look at this issue realistically.

I am advised by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] that since the 1964 flood there has been a reservoir created upstream and there has been no significant flood since that reservoir was created in 1974. But I think there is something more important that we need to talk about here today, and that issue is how this body is going to operate.

Let me read to you from a letter that I received. This is from the committee.

We have been pleased to support your efforts on behalf of your constituency to include provisions in H.R. 3678 which will meet vital water resource needs. We ask that you support the committee in its effort to resist these amendments so that the other Members who would be adversely affected by the adopton of those amendments can enjoy the same benefits from our national resources program as your constituency will with the passage of H.R. 3678.

Please be assured that if other amendments surface which adversely affect your interest, we will vigorously oppose them.

Mr. Chairman, it does not say whether those are good projects or bad projects, or whether they are justified or not.

Now let me read to you from a newspaper article on letters that apparently some people received from a member of the committee.

In the past I have been pleased to respond to your requests for assistance. I hope that now when I need your help I can count on your continued vote.

I would be most appreciative if you would contact me directly about your position on my request.

Mr. Chairman, here is a list that is put out of the people who voted against the committee yesterday, with black marks for the people who have projects in this particular bill.

My objection, Mr. Chairman, is that we should decide these things on their merits. I should feel free to vote for or against the amendment offered by Mr. HOPKINS according to whether I think it has merit or not, and I should not have to vote against Mr. HOPKINS because of the fact that I might lose a project therein.

We have just finished voting to increase the Federal debt. We have just voted that we are going to increase charges for people who have medicare. Mr. Chairman, how can we possibly say that it is all right for us to make this determination according to whether or not we have other projects.

Before we are too quick to say that the fault is all with the members of the committee, I submit to you that it is not just the members of the committee. I submit that it is us. It is you and me. It is every Member of this body, because if we are going to have the courage to stand up and vote for what we think is right, regardless of whether we are going to lose our projects, then everything will be all right. It is easy to point our fingers at the other person, but we are the ones.

My challenge to you people as you vote on this amendment is to decide what is right. Vote for what is right. If you think Mr. HOPKINS is wrong, then you ought to vote against him. If you think Mr. SNYDER is wrong, you ought to vote against him. But if we are going to represent the taxpayers of America, if we are going to operate this place the way it ought to operate, then I plead with you to have the courage to vote what you think is the right thing in regard to this amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEDELL. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have the time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not know the gentleman's time had expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have the time. I would be delighted to hear from the gentleman, but I would prefer that he take it from this side over here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL] has expired.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. I thank the gentleman for yielding. The gentleman from Iowa need not stay in the well any longer.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that what the gentleman from Iowa referred to about our committee, with the list with black marks on it, I believe that the gentleman should have added that what he has, I presume, is a Xerox copy of the paper and it only comes out in black on our Xerox machines. Had we been able to, we would have had them with little red hearts on them.

What we did also, in having so many people opposed to our position on the vote last night, after we had sent them information about the Florida Barge Canal and other things and we were surprised that they did not vote that way, we wanted to talk to them this morning. Virtually every one that I spoke to today about that had never seen the letter that we sent out in relation to that.

That answered our question as to why we were not as successful as we might have been in the vote that occurred last evening.

I just thought that ought to be made a part of the record, lest anyone feel that there was any attempt by the gentleman from Iowa to impute anything to the members of my committee, who I feel do a good, open and honest job as representatives of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Kentucky give me 15 seconds?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, how much time do we have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] has 8 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER] has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

Mr. BEDELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, my objection is that the dots are only for those people who had projects in the bill. It seems to me that the consideration should not be based upon whether you have a project in the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for 15 seconds?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HOWARD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I did that because those are the people we had written the letter to, only the ones with projects in the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, we gather here today to make a decision that is rather difficult for many of us who have two friends on opposite sides of this issue, but I would like to speak today briefly about the impact of projects such as this and the priorities of this Nation.

Today in my district, at Branson, MO, on the banks of Table Rock Lake, there is a gathering where our people are commemorating the 25th anniversary of the completion of Table Rock Lake. Table Rock Lake is a project that was proposed in this House in the late 1940's, the early 1950's, by the gentleman who represented that district prior to my time, the Honorable Dewey Short of Missouri.

It was in the Ozark Mountains, where we had a lot of poverty. The ravaging White River periodically wiped out homes in flooding that had brought a great deal of anxiety and a great deal of suffering to the people of those Ozark Mountains. It was poor country. Unemployment was always high. The taxes on the land many times were not paid because the value of the land did not justify the payment of the taxes.

Dewey Short and President Truman from Missouri had a dream that that country could be different. Table Rock Lake was completed and today it is one of the most booming parts of the State of Missouri; 44 percent of all of the growth in the State of Missouri during the last 10 years occurred in my district around Table Rock Lake. Today there are jobs, there are opportunities, there are new schools, there are new homes, senior citizens have moved into the area and retired, and it has become one of the most prosperous areas of our State.

I think that that investment that was wisely made by this House in 1952 on the insistence of the then Congessman Dewey Short, with the support of President Truman, eventually signed into law by President Eisenhower, was a good investment not only for my area but also for America, because today in that area is the lowest unemployment rate for the entire State of Missouri, and it has been made so because of the economic expansion that has been brought about by a project that was passed by this House.

So, Mr. Chairman, let me say this. We talked a lot today about raising the national debt ceiling and it did not please me. I voted for it because I think we ought to pay our bills, but I think that the priorities that we place on what we do in this country are something that the American people expect.

I think they expect us to look out first for America. We have spent over $300 billion since the end of World War II in spreading the largesse of this Nation around the world to foreign countries. The Corps of Engineers has spent over $25 billion in Saudi Arabia since 1963 in helping to rebuild dams, rivers, harbors, and reservoirs for foreign countries.

I say that we need to make those investments in America and in places like Falmouth, KY, where they, too, need the assistance that we received in the southern Ozark Mountains, which paid off; and the jobs, the opportunities, the schools, and the growth that has occurred there have paid for it many times over.

I just want to close by saying this. Above the Chamber here is a quotation from a great American, Daniel Webster. He said, "Let us develop the resources of our land. Let us build upon its institutions. Let us promote all of its great interests and see whether we in our generation might do something worthy to be remembered."

We have that opportunity here today.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER] yield 3 minutes to me, please?

Mr. SNYDER. I am sorry. I promised 1 minute to the gentleman here and 5 minutes to the sponsor of the bill. I would love to. I wish I could.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. PACKARD], and I will reserve the last 5 minutes for the manager of the bill.

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the essence of this amendment is that whether a local cost-sharing issue ought to be a part of this project. I support local cost sharing, but I recognize that this body must maintain the ability to either waive or to modify that cost-sharing formula to fit the area where a project might need to be built.

Most communities where there are problems of flooding and tornadoes and other natural disasters are areas that would be least capable of supporting high cost-sharing formulas. In this case, it appears to me that we have a community that is devastated regularly by destructive forces that make them the least capable of absorbing the cost-sharing elements. Therefore, they would be precluded from enjoying the benefits of protection.

I would suggest that we oppose the amendment and allow the project to go forward.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LUNGREN].

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, I understand that what I am about to say is not going to be very helpful to me or my district, but I think it has to be said.

I do not mind dealing with a bill or an amendment on an objective analysis. I do not mind someone coming to me and saying, "Listen to my side."

What I do object to is being told that there is a target list for those of us who decided last night that we would vote one way rather than the other. I had friends on both sides of the amendment that was offered last night and I really found myself in the middle of a very tough decision. After I made the decision to vote for that amendment, to be told and to be shown a target list that had been put out by the committee that those of us who did that will have to worry about it and to be told that if we dare vote for this particular amendment, our particular projects are in jeopardy, I think is not appropriate to this institution.

To be called by the ports in my district and told that irrespective of the merits of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS], we want you to vote against this because we are fearful for our ports, does not do this House justice.

To be told that other Members are receiving phone calls from mayors of small communities in Iowa that have nothing to do with this amendment, telling them to vote against the Hopkins amendment because they are fearful of projects that are in their districts, does not do us justice.

By saying this, I know I may jeopardize the ports in my district and I may jeopardize any water project or public works project I may ever bring to that committee, but there is something that is more important to me than the ports in my district; that is my personal integrity, the integrity of the constituents that I represent and the integrity of this institution.

It has made it almost impossible for me to look at this vote objectively when I have been told by the advocates against the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] not to look objectively at this particular amendment.

That is not the way we should do business in this House. Legislative blackball or blackmail is not the way to do business in this House. I must say that I just bitterly resent it. I have been told by some that if I do something like this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, I have been told that if I did something about talking like this that I can forget about getting on particular committees from my side of the aisle.

Well, I will do that, because it means more to me to look at the question and to vote the way I think is right than to be told that I am going to be blackballed from now on. When I am told to blindly vote against the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] and blindly vote against the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI] and that if I do not, retribution will come on my head, and not only on my head but on the hands of the constituents that I represent, somebody has got to say something.

This House does itself a disservice by treating its Members that way and for Members to suggest that we ought not to look at the integrity of an amendment that is presented to us does no justice to any Member in this House, does no justice to any constituent in any district that we represent.

I am not saying that the position of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER] is wrong or right or that the committee position is wrong or right. But when I am told that I am supposed to close my eyes and blindly follow the committee or retribution will be visited upon me and my constituents, I cannot remain silent in this body.

I think, Mr. Chairman, we had better reconsider the way we operate if that is the way we are going to do it.

I would be happy to listen to the arguments on both sides and I was moved by the very comments of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER], but this is not the way that we ought to operate in this House.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr Chairman, I am wanting to close myself in the debate this afternoon, if I may. I do not know how much time is left between the two sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER] has 5 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] has 5 minutes remaining.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROEMER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, in light of the statements of the Congressman from California, permit me to say as a Kentucky Congressman that it is getting a little tiresome for certain Members of Congress to remind me that I have a $4,500,000 project called the Obion Creek Watershed in this particular bill. I would hope that we would vote on the merits of this legislation instead of reminding different Members of what projects they have in this particular public works and transportation bill.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say in the short time that I have that I served my first 2 years in the Congress on the Public Works Committee under the leadership of Chairman JIM HOWARD, he is the best in the House, and under the specific leadership of the gentleman from New Jersey, BOB ROE, on the Subcommittee on Water. I enjoyed my 2 years there. I hated to leave, but the banking system needed some cleaning up. You guys were doing a great job on water.

So I rise with some reluctance to oppose my former committee and strongly support the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS].

All the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] has going for him is that he is right. He does not have any political muscle. He is one of those Members of Congress that chooses his times wisely and well. You would know him as kind of a quiet, strong type.

I saw him rise on Lebanon, and he was right there.

I saw him rise time and again on the budget, and he has been right there.

The only thing he has had going for him here is maybe not the votes, certainly not the muscle, nobody from the White House is calling me for him, nobody from the committee is calling me for him. What he has got is the facts. The facts are this project's cost-benefit ratio is unjustifiable in terms of spending tax dollars.

The committee might say there are other projects in America the same way. But I do not think they are being built. If they are we ought to know about it.

The gentleman from Kentucky, all he has is the facts. The facts are that the people of the area affected, not at the site where it is being built but where the land is being flooded, where the land will forever be wet, say "no." In fact, the people of Kentucky do not want to come up with a minimal cost sharing because they do not support it.

I urge you to support our colleague from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS]. He is right. He might be alone, but he is right.

Mr. HOPKINS. I thank the gentleman.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, since it is my amendment, would it be improper for me to close out the debate on this issue?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER], closes on behalf of the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, then I wonder if I might ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER], if he would mind if I close this issue this afternoon.

Mr. SNYDER. I have been requested by the chairman of the subcommittee to let him have the closing 5 minutes, and I have made that commitment. I will have to honor it.

Mr. HOPKINS. How much time do I have remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will be delighted to yield.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the gentleman begins his 3 minutes, I would like to commend the gentleman for his leadership and for risking himself. And I would like to compliment the debate, particularly those who have shown the courage to stand up and speak out on this issue, and I commend the gentleman for his leadership. I think he is right and I urge my colleague to support his amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely appreciate the attention that my colleagues have given me and the others that have participated this afternoon in the debate on both sides.

Someone said to me that this is going to be decided on the merit system. I have the merits. Somebody else has the system.

I realize that some of my colleagues are under a great deal of pressure this afternoon. Some believe that if this dam is jeopardized that their projects in their districts might be jeopardized. It is called the go along to get along system in Washington.

I do not think there is any reason for this debate to deteriorate to the point that it becomes an eye for an eye. Martin Luther King said if that happens we will all go blind.

Some of the people here on this floor from time to time, Mr. Chairman, preach fiscal responsibility. Some of the people on this floor, Mr. Chairman, from time to time preach fairness.

I submit to all of the people on this floor today that it is time to come to the altar of truth this afternoon. How can you ask your people to support an expenditure of $189 million that does not even come near to meeting cost-benefit, does not have the support of the people in the area of which this dam will be built. Ask yourselves if you are willing to add to the Federal deficit for a project whose benefits are 59 percent recreational.

Ladies and gentlemen, your constituents and mine are tired of this Government playing fun and games at their expense. What they want is some relief. What they deserve is honesty and fairness, Mr. Chairman, and I thank all of those who have participated this afternoon.

I would appreciate your support, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ROE. I want to thank the gentleman from Kentucky for yielding me the time to kind of sum up what we have been talking about.

You know we have the debate again between two brothers. I have listened with the greatest of patience to so many who have had the right to speak and express their views, all; but I tell you I, too, am a Member of this body. There are 435 of us and each and every one of us are trying to do the right thing.

I have listened today very well. They really did not look at the project. It is alleged that it was slipped in. It was an ugly thing to do and some abomination along the line, which I take very personally the point of view that BOB ROE would waste his time and his energy, to threaten someone.

I may ask someone to help me. If that is so wrong, I am guilty. But to have a Member stand up here from California and say he was threatened to vote for the bill or he was going to lose, and he resented that, that he wants to make his point to America that he is being threatened because he believes in something.

The two brothers believe they are right, the two brothers from Kentucky, as the brothers did and the sisters from Florida last night.

This is not personal. We seek, as the gentleman from Kentucky said, what is the right thing to do. Do not come down on the head of the Public Works and Transportation Committee because you cannot get your own house together.

We do not agree on everything in New Jersey, but we try. We do not agree on everything in other States, but we try.

You have one vote. I have one vote. We together have the votes for a majority to lose.

Let me tell you some facts. This dam is located in Mr. HOPKINS' district or vice versa, Mr. SNYDER'S district, and the land to be flooded is located in Mr. HOPKINS' district. And of course they are concerned. You know we have new redistricting in New Jersey. I do not have the same district I had 3 months ago. The Supreme Court changed us. I am not fighting for my district alone. I am fighting for my State and my Nation.

What we are fighting for here is a water supply system for the country. The crisis before America is not the oil and energy alone. That is not the crisis. That is a serious one.

I will tell you a crisis now happening is the water supply of this country. Do we have the right, any one of us, and that was eloquently stated by one of the Members here earlier, do we have the right to say this is mine, this is my little land, you cannot build a highway, you cannot build a bridge, you cannot build a reservoir because somebody's land may be flooded?

I sympathize with that. And somebody said so. Look over here, here is a chart and that is 1964 and it has not flooded in 10 years.

I have news for you. In the State of New Jersey, in Wayne, NJ, we have not had a flood for the last 7 or 8 years and everybody went ahead and did their thing and put on the additions to their houses. We had it visited on us, and my town was under 18 feet of water. People drowned.

Oh, it did not happen. The Sun was shining. But it did happen.

Now the challenge before us in this legislation is do we develop a national, fair system of water supply system for the Nation. Are we concerned about the resources of the country? Is this a type of issue that we need be concerned with? The answer is yes.

Now, the brothers disagree. The merits of the case is whether or not we are going to build this program, and I happen to believe that Mr. SNYDER is right.

Let me close with two points, and I know time is so desperately short. I hear encomiums along the line, there might be other projects in the bill where the cost sharing, you know, is not the nickel and dime end of it, but let me tell you something so that you know what is in the bill and now it has got to be said. In the Mississippi Basin of which there are seven States, and hear me from those seven States, the program in that basin under the Mississippi River Basin Commission structure is that any project that is built in there is built on the old authorization and they do not pay matching money. Look it up in the law.

So do not talk about whose ox is being gored and who is raiding the public till. The gentleman talked about the terrible costs of these projects, and yet he came from California. And I remind him that the Santa Ana project is $1.2 billion, of which a very small amount will be paid by them.

Is it wrong? Of course it is not wrong, because they need the flood control and the help there. But do not come and complain about a $100 million project here if you are willing to take $1.2 billion for your district.

Now, what is the point here? The point is equity, fair play. We have studied this program. There has not been one issue that has been presented of value against this project, and I would urge our Members on the merits of the case to vote no on the amendment.

□ 1730

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Vento for, with Mr. Nelson of Florida against.

Mr. Garcia for, with Mr. Breaux against.

Mr. Solarz for, with Mr. Pritchard against.

Mr. HAYES changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will rise informally in order that the House may receive a message.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Speaker resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will receive a message.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 328. Concurrent resolution to correct technical errors in the enrollment of the bill H.R. 4170.

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its sitting.

WATER RESOURCES CONSERVATION, DEVELOPMENT, AND INFRASTRUCTURE IMPROVEMENT AND REHABILITATION ACT OF 1983

The Committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. YOUNG] rise?

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage in a colloquy with the gentleman.

Section 1107 of this bill modifies prior authority in Public Law 97-128 to include Franklin County, MO, and to increase the estimated cost to $100 million to allow the Secretary to deal with regional flood problems in this area of Missouri.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether it is correct to state that this provision in the legislation is not intended to authorize the construction of the Union Dam at this time.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. The gentleman is correct. The Union Dam was authorized by the Congress in the Flood Control Act of June 28, 1938, Public Law 761-75. That authorization remains in effect. However, the Congress has not funded construction of the project. Before construction could take place on the Union Dam, the Congress would need to appropriate general construction funds for the project.

In addition, it is my understanding that since approximately 10 years have elapsed since any planning has been accomplished for this project, additional engineering would be necessary to make sure that the project meets contemporary needs and public views.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ALBOSTA

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1174. The Secretary is authorized and directed to construct a second lock 1,294 feet in length, 115 feet in width, and 32 feet in depth, adjacent to the existing lock at Sault Sainte Marie, Michigan, at full Federal expense and at an estimated cost of $240,000,000.

Mr. ALBOSTA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering to H.R. 3678, the Water Resources Development Act, will authorize the constuction of a new lock at Sault Ste. Marie, MI.

There are currently four locks at the Soo, but only one lock, the Poe lock, is large enough to handle the 1,000-foot ships that come through the Great Lakes. When the Poe lock is down for repair or maintenance, there is no way these large ships can navigate through the locks.

In the past decade or so, the U.S.-flag fleet has become increasingly dependent upon vessels of a size which can only transit the Poe lock. In fact, of the 111 vessels currently registered with the Lake Carriers' Association, 25 have length and/or beam dimensions which exceed the limitations of the MacArthur, Davis, and Sabin locks.

These 25 carriers boast a combined per trip capacity of 1,165,353 gross tons—45 percent of U.S.-flag fleets' total per trip capacity—so should the Poe lock be taken out of service for even a short period time, many of the industry's most efficient vessels would be cut off from the trade route for which they were designed. During a national emergency, this loss of capacity could even imperil the Nation's defense.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers also recognizes the need for an additional Poe-sized lock; just recently the corps made the construction of the new lock part of their national economic development plan in their Draft Interim Feasibility Report on improvements to the Great Lakes connecting channels and harbors. The report, issued by the north central division, indicates that the need for the new lock arises from two major events: The need for major rehabilitation on the two existing smaller locks in the absence of a new lock; and the need for the new lock in the event of a shutdown of the current large lock which would play havoc with normal shipping on the Great Lakes, but more important, would be critical in a time of national emergency when the transport of raw materials to our industrial centers would be imperative.

The corps has estimated the cost of the new lock at $240 million, with annual economic benefits of $79 million. The cost of repairing the Davis lock—which will have to be done if the new lock is not built—is $149 million, and does not carry with it the economic benefits of increased large capacity shipping, nor the elimination of delay time experienced by shippers waiting at the only large lock, estimated at 3.2 hours per vessel at 80 percent lock capacity.

This project is strongly supported by the Governor of Michigan, the Michigan Legislature, the Lake Carriers' Association, and the Great Lakes Commission.

In conclusion, let me say the Great Lakes are our Nation's fourth seacoast, and we need to make sure the shipping facilities are modernized to keep the grain, steel, and many other manufactured goods moving smoothly through the lakes. Not only will the people of Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin benefit from another large lock at Sault Ste. Marie, but the entire country will benefit by insuring efficient shipping facilities on the Great Lakes for our economy and our national defense.

I urge adoption of my amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBOSTA. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the aisle have reviewed this amendment, and we have no objection to it.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBOSTA. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, we have studied the amendment on this side. The committee has looked at this new lock, and we have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, I thank both the chairman and the ranking minority member of this subcommittee.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBOSTA. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment for a new large lock at Sault Ste. Marie, MI.

The cost of this project would be $240 million, but it is important to note that the annual economic benefits would be $79 million. The lock would replace the existing Davis and Sabin locks, which are in need of rehabilitation by the next decade. I just note that rehabilitation of the Davis lock alone would cost $149 million. The project's benefit/cost ratio is 3:2.

I would like to make several additional points regarding this amendment based on the recently released "Army Corps of Engineers North Central Division Draft Interim Feasibility Report on Improvements to the Great Lakes Connecting Channels and Harbors," dated June 19, 1984.

The first is the dependency on the existing locks, especially the Poe lock. One aspect of the analysis of the need for added capacity at the "Soo" locks which merits special attention is the degree of dependency that exists on continuous operation of the Poe lock now during the navigation season. It is the only lock whose length, width, and depth are sufficient in all respects to adequately service 32 of the largest vessels in the Great Lakes fleet.

In 1982's shipping season, of the total number of downbound transits made by U.S. dry cargo vessels, 49 percent were by vessels requiring the use of the Poe lock. These vessels carried 71 percent of total downbound tonnage through the Soo locks.

Damage or possible disruption to the Poe lock is a serious concern. From 1971 to 1982, there were a total of 55,565 passages through the Poe lock, an average of 4,630 per shipping season. During this period, 36 incidents of damage to the lock or possible disruption to the lock occurred, averaging three incidents per season. Six of these incidents were identified as serious enough to have caused interruption of service at the lock for several hours.

This may not sound like a big problem. However, with hourly operating costs of a 1,000-foot vessel now in excess of $3,000, it is clear that any delay is significant. If at any time the Poe lock were down for just 1 day, the cost to a single shipper would be about $73,000. With an average of 15 transits through the Poe lock each day of the shipping season, the economic loss of any shutdown is apparent.

Further, the cargo being transported on the Great Lakes through the locks is all important to the economy of this country: grain, iron ore, and western coal. For an average month over a 9-month season, 2.5 million tons of grain, some 7 million tons of iron ore, and 600,000 tons of western coal might be shipped through the Poe lock.

The second is national defense considerations. The dependency on the Poe lock would be even more critical under national emergency mobilization conditions. With a new lock on line, all of the forecasted tonnage under mobilization conditions could be comfortably serviced. The capacity of this new lock, the current large lock—Poe—and the remaining small lock—the McArthur—would be 237 million short tons. Further, delay hours would be significantly reduced, which would be critical in a mobilization situation. Because of the need for added tonnage of raw materials and the need for speedy transport of those materials to our industrial centers during a national emergency, it would be of great importance to have a second large lock.

The third is energy savings with a new lock. The energy impact of replacing the Sabin-Davis locks with the larger lock is positive. The larger lock results in less energy being consumed. Looking at the iron ore trade, the fuel savings—because of larger, more fuel-efficient vessels, and the reduction of delay time—range from 4 to 6 percent per year through the year 2050. This translates into 219,290,000 gallons of fuel that could be saved by the iron ore shippers alone during a 50-year period. Similar benefits would accrue in the case of the shipment of grain and other materials.

The fourth is Soo area benefits. Chippewa County experienced average annual unemployment rates in excess of 20 percent in 1981 and 1982, and a rate of over 30 percent in 1983. This project would provide some 400 to 500 construction jobs over a 5-year construction period and about 100 non-construction jobs. Thus, this project will have a significant beneficial impact on this area.

In summary, the total benefits would be as follows:

Average annual vessel delay savings	$35,027,000
Average annual vessel utilization savings (using larger, more efficient vessels)	38,716,000
Average annual vessel rate savings	306,000
Average annual disruption cost avoided	2,700,000
Average annual area redevelopment benefit	2,360,000
Total average annual benefit	79,109,000

This project is supported by Michigan Governor Blanchard, the Michigan Legislature, local governments, the Lakes Carriers' Association, the Great Lakes Commission, the Army Corps of Engineers, and Senators DON RIEGLE and CARL LEVIN of Michigan.

I thank the gentleman from Michigan for offering this amendment and thank Chairman ROE of the Water Resources Subcommittee; Chairman HOWARD of the Public Works and Transportation Committee; Mr. STANGELAND, the ranking member of the subcommittee; Mr. SNYDER, the ranking member of the full committee; and their staffs for the cooperation in bringing this provision to a successful conclusion. Finally, I urge my colleagues to approve this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALBOSTA].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the members of the committee, we are trying our best, believe me, to get this bill completed as rapidly as we can. We know Members are waiting for planes, and so am I, and Members are going to weddings and graduations. We apologize for that, but there is no other faster way we can move.

Now, we have two other key amendments that are to be decided by the committee, one is the amendment being offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY], having to do with the Water Resources Board established in the bill, and the second one has to do with the Petri amendment, which has to do with the funding and cost sharing, and so forth, in the legislation.

Now, we had hoped to bring up the amendment of Mr. PETRI first so that we could get into that, but I understand that is not the arrangement that has been made, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY] wants to offer his amendment first, and then we would go on to the Petri amendment. On the Petri amendment there is a tentative agreement, as I understand it, which we will perfect in the next few minutes I hope, that that debate would be only for 1 hour, one-half hour on one side and one-half hour on the other.

A couple of Members have some colloquies which they would like to undertake, which will probably take a few minutes, so if we can just indulge these Members for a few minutes, then we can go on to the Cheney amendment.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the gentleman and the committee for their good work, and I rise in strong support of this legislation which provides for the conservation and development of water resources and the improvement and rehabilitation of the Nation's water resources infrastructure.

As many of you know, I have a keen interest in a little project called Boggy Creek in this bill. I won't take time at this late hour to go into detail about this project, except to say that it is of vital importance to the residents of the city of Austin. Boggy Creek has met all the feasibility studies, and the Corps of Engineers has been waiting for nearly 10 years to start work.

But beyond my personal interest in this legislation, I rise in support of the bill because I sincerely believe that we should move decisively to adopt a national water resources policy which is the thrust of this legislation.

As we all know, the last water resources development bill was signed into law in 1976. The last true construction authorization bill was signed into law in 1970. As a result, over this 14-year period, a very large backlog of projects, including the Boggy Creek project in my district, have been postponed or delayed.

Adoption of the bill will enable us to move in a responsive and expeditious manner to meet the critical water resources problems in our Nation. I know that this is an extremely costly bill, and I realize that all of the projects in the bill will probably not survive the appropriations process, but, nevertheless, I think the House should move forward on this important legislation. I appeal to the Members to approve this legislation.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE] and the committee for the fine work they have done on this bill, and I would like to have a colloquy with the gentleman about some jurisdictional matters.

As you know, the Committee on Ways and Means has jurisdiction over customs, collection districts and ports, as well as revenue measures generally. Consequently, I am concerned about title XIII of H.R. 3678, which establishes a Port Infrastructure Development and Improvement Trust Fund consisting of an appropriation equal to the customs duties collected during the preceding fiscal year, not to exceed $2 billion for each year.

I am concerned that while title XIII does not appropriate customs revenues directly to the fund, the linkage of appropriations to an equivalent amount of customs duties collected could be prejudicial to future trade legislation that reduces customs duties or authorizes negotiations to reduce tariffs.

Chairman ROE, is my understanding correct that it is not the intention of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation in linking appropriations to customs collections to seek jurisdiction, or to influence future consideration by the Committee on Ways and Means or by the House of legislation that may reduce customs revenues?

Mr. ROE. The gentleman is absolutely correct in his understanding of the section of the bill. There is no way nor is it the intent of the committee in any way to get jurisdiction.

Mr. GIBBONS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WHITTAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WHITTAKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding in order that we may enter into a colloquy to discuss part of the cost-share provisions for the flood control project for Halstead, KS. This project is being authorized in section 301 of the bill that is before the House.

Part of the cost-share being considered by the city of Halstead deals with the city's possible use of outside groups to assist in performing work such as clearing brush and trees, land improvement and grading. As an example, the city of Halstead has been in contact with the Kansas Department of Corrections regarding the possibility of having inmates from the nearby Kansas State Industrial Reformatory in Hutchinson, KS, perform this work. Another contact the city has made is with the Kansas Army National Guard concerning the likelihood of having Guard units conduct their weekend and summer exercises in the area, thus utilizing the Guard's heavy equipment and manpower for basic land improvement.

In addition to this work, the community is also exploring the possibility of applying for funding under the Small Cities Community Development Block Grant Program to be used in acquiring the necessary lands, easements, rights-of-ways, and other costs incurred for the flood control project. The Comptroller of the United States, in a decision filed May 23, 1977, found that block grant funds under title 1 of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974 may be accepted by the Corps of Engineers as part of the project's local cooperation requirement.

Is it the gentleman's understanding that this decision rendered in May 1977, is still valid for Federal flood control projects, and that the earlier mentioned in-kind assistance, along with its benefits, would be accepted by the Army Corps of Engineers as part of the community's non-Federal responsibility in accordance with section 302(g)(2) of this bill?

Mr. ROE. Yes, the gentleman's understanding is absolutely correct.

Mr. WHITTAKER. I thank the chairman.

Mr. SHAW. Will the chairman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, if I could have your attention and the gentleman from Ocala, FL, Mr. MACKAY, at this particular point, we had a long and rather inclusive debate regarding the cross florida barge canal yesterday evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE] has expired.

(On request of Mr. SHAW and by unanimous consent, Mr. ROE was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHAW. One thing was abundantly clear, and I think we can all agree on. To continue to do nothing puts us in jeopardy of losing everything. I think therefore it is most important to the State of Florida, I think it is important certainly to the credibility of this committee, and I think it is important to the gentleman from New Jersey and I know it is very important to both sides of the issue on the Florida congressional delegation that the committee have hearings and actually go down to Florida and have an on-site hearing with regard to this most important project and this precious land that the gentleman referred to last night in his speech as a national treasure.

We consider it a national and a vital treasure and a State treasure in the State of Florida. I would ask the gentleman if he would repeat to me the conversation that we had and with Mr. MACKAY with regard to hearings and going into Mr. MACKAY's district and actually having on-site hearings; on-site inspection.

Mr. ROE. I have no objection. In the spirit of the discussion last night that we had on that very important issue that it would be a good idea, and the time is at hand, for sure, to look into that matter, and we will be glad to do so.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STANGELAND. I concur with what the chairman just said; it is exactly what I suggested in my discussion last evening that we ought to do, and I think it is an appropriate thing for him to do in the next Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this bill.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of engaging the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee in a brief colloquy about a provision in section 501(a) of the bill which is referred to in the committee report on page 225, known as the Metropolitan Atlanta Area, GA. This is a water supply project, Mr. Chairman, which will authorize funds for the possible construction of a reregulation dam on the Chattahoochee River. Because it has been 15 years since there was a major omnibus water resources bill of this sort, if this authorization were not included by the chairman this option would not likely exist in the foreseeable future.

I take this time, because as the chairman knows, the increased water supply for the growing metropolitan area of Atlanta is vital for the continued good quality of life of its citizens and the economic well-being of its community.

Whatever course is followed, we must meet this need. This particular reregulation dam project is one that has been looked at for quite some time but we do not believe the final chapter has yet been written on this. Therefore, although there are funds authorized in this bill, we have meticulously spelled out in the legislation a need for additional studies to be made by the Corps of Engineers with a report back to the Congress, an evaluation of that report and alternatives, and a requirement that nothing would be done until the appropriate committees of the House and the other body have acted, and of course, we would still have the appropriations process which would require an act of Congress.

It also is made clear in our committee report, Mr. Chairman, that this bill must be read in context and in conjunction with the bill that created the Chattahoochee River National Recreation Area, that is, Public Law 94-344.

What I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee is this: If it is both his understanding and that I have the assurances of his cooperation that this study and report which is going to be called for is not simply going to be a perfunctory, pro forma cosmetic study, but will be a bona fide, serious, objective, in-depth study in which there will be full public participation, in which information will be made fully, freely, and currently available to all interested parties so that there can be full input from the local governments, regional authorities, business and conservation groups, and especially the public, and that wherever possible, outside and independent assessments will be utilized, permitted, and provided, so that when the Congress makes the final decision, it will be a genuine decision made upon the facts and not simply a glossover and a pro forma operation.

I yield to my distinguished chairman for his response.

Mr. ROE. The gentleman's observations are exactly correct because we have particularly, and I am thinking of your water resources matters in the State of Georgia and around Atlanta and water supply for the city of Atlanta that you have spoken to, it is the absolute intent of the committee that it is to be clear, concise technical data that is necessary with full participation by our people.

Mr. LEVITAS. I thank the chairman for that assurance and I will be working very closely with him and the members of the committee to assure that this is done. I will be watching it like a hawk, and I will have rigorous oversight hearings if there is any deviation from the letter or spirit of the law.

We must have an adequate water supply for Metropolitan Atlanta and we also want to make sure that we do it in the way that is most compatible with conservation, with environmental concerns, with fish and wildlife recreation and the Chattahoochie National Recreation Area. We have spelled this out meticulously in the bill, and we will provide the water that has made this region grow and we are fortunate to have this pure and abundant resource which, if properly managed, will lay the basis for a great future.

I yield to my good friend and colleague from Georgia, [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I appreciate the chairman's assurance on this while we have had various studies. The studies do call for a reregulation dam. There has been some confusion with the various groups. We would like to get it settled once and for all, and this is a grand opportunity to do that.

I thank the chairman for his support.

Mr. LEVITAS. I thank my colleague from Georgia for his observation and I have assured him that I will work with him. We will provide the necessary water supply. If there are environmentally and economically better alternatives we will find them. If this project is the only or best way that it can be done, this authorization will make this possible and then after this serious and full study is made, the appropriation process will be followed and, in the last analysis, Congress of the United States will make the decision.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CHENEY

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. CHENEY: Page 301, line 3: Delete Title XII in its entirety (Page 301, Line 3 through and including Page 313, Line 17).

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, Let me begin by apologizing to my colleagues for bringing up this important matter at this late hour on the last night before we adjourn for the July break. Many of us had hoped that we would be able to lay over this legislation and complete it after the July break, but obviously we do not control the agenda on our side of the aisle, and the majority has exercised its prerogative to say that we should stay and finish tonight and that is certainly within their jurisdiction.

Mr. Chairman, I am concerned, as the ranking Republican on the Water and Power Subcommittee of the Interior Committee that we are making a very serious mistake if we adopt the legislation in its present form.

I know the members of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, both the minority and majority side, have worked very long and very hard on this legislation.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CHENEY. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the Speaker has advised us that a resolution is now back from the Senate and he has asked us if we could rise now just to get that through and then we will come right back again, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. CHENEY. I would be happy to yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR., Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 3678) to provide for the conservation and development of water and related resources and the improvement and rehabilitation of the Nation's water resources infrastructure, had come to no resolution thereon.

CORRECTING TECHNICAL ERRORS IN THE ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 4170, TAX REFORM ACT OF 1983

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 328) entitled "Concurrent resolution to correct technical errors in the enrollment of the bill H.R. 4170," with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, does the Delegate have the right to object?

The SPEAKER. A Delegate does have the right to object to a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the Speaker.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman has done that. I responded to him as truthfully as I could. The resolution, when it left here, did not contain any language like that. When it went to the Senate, the Senate did not see fit to add the language that the gentleman seeks.

The House is powerless to make the changes. This is a very important resolution. I think the gentleman knows that I and many other Members here are very sympathetic with the problems of Puerto Rico. We have done everything we can to help. I hope that the gentleman will reconsider and allow us to get unanimous consent and not block this essential legislation.

This bill, this very important bill, cannot be enrolled, which means putting it on parchment and sending it down to the President to have it signed and to be the down payment on this very important program that the United States is involved in unless we have come comity.

Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBBONS. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Puerto Rico.

Mr. CORRADA. I will tell the gentleman that I have tried to resolve this. I brought it to the attention of the Members of the House. I brought it to the attention of the other body. I tried to work out something that was sensible, and not only sensible, but that would, in fact, respond to the actual intent of what the conferees did that night when they decided to terminate this program.

I wil. tell the gentleman that I intend to introduce a bill to correct some of what I believe are gross inequities done to Puerto Rico, in fact in violation of the Puerto Rican Federal Relations Act. I intend to introduce legislation to undo some of the things that are done here. I do not care about the continuation of the redistillation program. I believe that honestly that probably was a mistake. But I think that capping the rum excise tax and also eliminating the cane neutral spirits was going beyond what was necessary to correct what might have been perceived to have been some abuses there. I intend to introduce legislation to that effect.

Could I get some assurances from the gentleman that he will seek in the Committee on Ways and Means careful consideration of my bill, and that we have a fair hearing, and if necessary to take remedial action to correct it as it may be warranted? I, of course, do not want to ask the gentleman to tell me that he will support the legislation, but that there will be a prompt and fair consideration of this matter.

Mr. GIBBONS. I would certainly say that I think I know what Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI would do, and he controls the agenda, but I am sure that if I tell the gentleman that we will do what he asks to be done on this occasion that Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI will cooperate and do that.

We are very sensitive about the problems of giving you, as a representative of the people of Puerto Rico, an adequate hearing and to try to do all that we can to work out this so that there is no friction. I am sure Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI would agree to a hearing, and I will urge him to do so and will do all in my power, and I am sure the others here will do all in their power, to make sure that we have that kind of hearing.

Mr. CORRADA. If the gentleman will yield further, I do not want to be unreasonable and I do not want to be obstructive.

Mr. Speaker, with those remarks and assurances from the gentleman from Florida, whom I respect, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I have a different reason for reserving at this point.

Mr. Speaker, I would like the gentleman to explain the contents of this concurrent resolution, which is of considerable interest to the House, but there is one provision in it which I believe the Senate not only accepted but liberalized.

Would the gentleman explain the nature of that change and the other technical provisions that may have been altered in some way in the Senate which are, as far as I know, of rather modest consequence here in the House, but which the Members deserve to have explained to them in any event.

Mr. GIBBONS. If the gentleman will yield, let me say in the beginning that I want to read a statement that I think accurately reflects the total amount of this, and I will be glad to elaborate after that.

Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, immediately following consideration of the conference committee report on H.R. 4170, the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, the House agreed unanimously to House Congressional Resolution 328, a resolution to correct technical errors in the enrollment of the bill. That resolution directs the Clerk of the House to correct spelling, punctuation, cross-references, citations, and similar typographical and printing errors. The purpose of the resolution is to perfect the enrolled version of H.R. 4170 and is wholly consistent with the decisions of the conference committee.

House Concurrent Resolution 328, now at the desk, was passed by the Senate today, with an amendment. The Senate amendment added several additional corrections that were discovered after House passage. The amendment is consistent with the type of corrections that were contained in House Congressional Resolution 328 when it passed the House Wednesday.

The Senate amendment added corrections in the areas of life insurance and pensions, which were agreed upon by the conferees but were inadvertently dropped in the printing of the conference report. A third technical correction clarifies that low-income housing is excluded from the depreciation changes; a fourth technical amendment clarifies the effective date of the changes in the installment sale recapture rules. Another technical provision is intended to clarify and coordinate the market discount bond rules and the change in the holding period for capital assets. There are also two provisions that make typographical and technical wording corrections to the conference report language pertaining to qualified ESOP's. Finally, with respect to imputed interest, as it passed the House, the resolution lowered the safe-harbor test rate to 90 percent of the relevant Treasury rate and the imputed rate to 100 percent. The Senate modification provides that in the case of a principal residence, up to $250,000, or farm land with no dollar cap, the interest rates would be computed under the procedures provided by present law.

I have carefully reviewed these corrections, cleared them with the minority and urge the House to adopt the resolution as amended.

Mr. Speaker, I wish also to take note of a provision included in the conference report on H.R. 4170, which the House passed just 2 days ago. That provision requires taxpayers who owed $5 million or more in excise tax on distilled spirits, wine, beer, or tobacco products during the preceding calendar year to pay that tax by means of electronic funds transfer to a Federal Reserve Bank.

I have also been made aware that the Treasury appropriations bill for 1985, which the House of Representatives passed yesterday, includes a prohibition on the expenditure of Treasury Department funds "to implement changes" in the "mode of payment of excise taxes by law or regulations in effect on January 1, 1981." The conferees on H.R. 4170 were aware that language such as that included in the present appropriations bill has been in the law for several years. It was for this reason that a specific statutory provision was included in H.R. 4170.

As a conferee on H.R. 4170, I would like to state unequivocally that it was the view of the conferees that the Congress in H.R. 4170, and not the Department of the Treasury has implemented the requirement of electronic funds transfer for certain persons liable for tobacco and alcohol product excise taxes. The cited provision in the appropriations bill has always been intended to prohibit the Treasury Department from implementing such a change. Because the Congress has implemented this change, the provision of the current Treasury Department appropriations bill should not be construed in a manner to restrict enforcement of the specific requirements of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended by H.R. 4170, that require payment of tax by electronic funds transfer.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, if I may make a further comment, the current law has a test rate of 9 percent. It is not related to the level of the applicable Treasury obligations and thus this is an easier rule and a liberalizing rule, given the current level of interest rates.

Mr. GIBBONS. That is correct.

Mr. CONABLE. The Senate, in other words, has taken the work done by the House in its concurrent resolution, further liberalized it and made it, I would judge, more acceptable to the Members of the House who are concerned about this particular issue.

Mr. GIBBONS. It has made it more acceptable to the House Members that I have talked to; in fact, I think most of the House, and to those people who are interested in this amendment.

Mr. CONABLE. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I think the Senate has made an important liberalizing change in those rules relating to the sale of homes and farms. The realtors group with whom many of us discussed this problem before endorses this new language as being far better and far more attractive for the sale of homes and farms than the language which left the House, so I think the House should be very pleased with its result.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CONABLE. It is also my understanding, Mr. Speaker, speaking further under my reservation, that the change that was made relative to the $250,000 in reference to the sale of a house has to do with the entire sale and not the debt instrument. That is generally for the benefit then of the smaller homeowners. I think that was what the Members intended as well.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the clarification. This is a clarifying process we are going through or we would not be here at all.

Mr. Speaker, in the light of the clarification the gentleman has given, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the legislation just considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE AND THE SENATE FROM FRIDAY, JUNE 29, 1984, OR SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1984, UNTIL MONDAY, JULY 23, 1984, OR UNTIL A DATE PURSUANT TO SECTION 2 OF THE SUBJECT CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 334) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 334

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the House adjourns on Friday, June 29, 1984, and that when the Senate adjourns on Friday, June 29, 1984, or on Saturday, June 30, 1984, pursuant to a motion made by the Majority Leader in accordance with this resolution, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday, July 23, 1984, or until 12 o'clock meridian on the second day after Members are notified to reassemble pursuant to section 2 of this concurrent resolution, whichever occurs first.

SEC. 2. The Speaker of the House and the Majority Leader of the Senate, acting jointly after consultation with the Minority Leader of the House and the Minority Leader of the Senate, shall notify the Members of the House and the Senate, respectively, to reassemble whenever, in their opinion, the public interest shall warrant it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the concurrent resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 319, nays 9, not voting 105, as follows:

Mr. PENNY changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

So the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO ACCEPT RESIGNATIONS, AND TO APPOINT COMMISSIONS, BOARDS, AND COMMITTEES, NOTWITHSTANDING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding any adjournment of the House until Monday, July 23, 1984, the Speaker be authorized to accept resignations, and to appoint commissions, boards, and committees authorized by law or by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

REQUEST TO DISPENSE WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY, JULY 25, 1984

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday, July 25, 1984.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALKER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. FRENZEL. To make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, my inquiry is: Would a Member who intended to make a motion that the House do now adjourn, would that Member expect or might he expect some expeditious handling of the House's business were he to refrain from doing so? And would it be possible to get some assurances from the Speaker and from the managers of the bill as to how long we would be here and what kind of business we are going to transact this evening?

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes that the gentleman has made an exceptionally unusual request of the Chair, but let me explain to the gentleman: If a motion to adjourn were made at this particular time and the House agreed, the House would adjourn until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning because the resolution that was just passed must be passed by the Senate before we can adjourn to the day that was required by the adjournment resolution.

The Chair, too, appreciates the question of the gentleman and hopes that we can expeditiously complete the business of the evening and I am sure that the gentleman's question of the Chair is a notice to the managers of the bill.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the Speaker.

WATER RESOURCES CONSERVATION, DEVELOPMENT, AND INFRASTRUCTURE IMPROVEMENT AND REHABILITATION ACT OF 1983

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to House Resolution 515 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 3678.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, (H.R. 3678) to provide for the conservation and development of water and related resources and the improvement and rehabilitation of the Nation's water resources infrastructure, with Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR., in the chair.

The clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose earlier today, the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE], was considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment and was open for amendment at any point.

Pending was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY].

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY] is recognized for 4 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. CHENEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I will try to expedite the proceedings to the best of my ability.

As I mentioned in my earlier remarks before I was interrupted, I am a strong supporter of water projects; they are vital to my State and I understand the sincere effort that has been made by the members of the Public Works Committee to authorize new projects in this bill.

But when the bill was referred sequentially to the Interior Committee, we debated at great length title XII because title XII does some things that many of us believe are very harmful.

Many of us are concerned that title XII creates a brandnew Federal entity to control Federal water policy, that it establishes an extremely bad precedent for those of us who believe very deeply in the proposition that we have always adhered to in the past, that the States have fundamental control over their own water.

Now, in committee when we considered it in the Interior Committee, a serious effort was made to delete title XII. We were unsuccessful. But I think it is important today to bring up the point that this bill marks a major fundamental change in Federal water policy.

It is not, it is not I repeat, just a shopping list of new starts authorized by the Public Works Committee.

The policy that is established in this bill for the future does not apply to any of the projects in the bill, but if it did, a great many of those projects would never survive the scrutiny that they would be subjected to.

The bill, among other things, mandates by law that the new Federal Water Board will operate in the future with the Carter water policy that was so discredited in the West during the Carter administration.

Now, I do not have any criticism to make of the former President other than to point out that he was extremely unpopular in the West and that lack of support was based primarily upon his water policies. But this bill that is before us today, mandates by law, that the Carter water policies, as published in the Federal Register during the Carter administration will become the policies to be pursued by the new board.

I think it is extremely unfortunate that the Public Works Committee has concluded that the right way to get the support of the environmental community for all of the water projects listed in the bill is to sell out the long-term proposition in terms of how we deal with water in the future.

I understand the sincerity and the integrity of the Members who have in effect made this deal, but I think it is an extremely unwise precedent to set.

Mr. Chairman, I would hope that my colleagues would join with me in deleting title XII. I think it is important that it be eliminated from the bill or many of us would feel constrained to oppose the bill on final passage and perhaps even to urge the administration to oppose the bill as well.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, one other point, the argument was made that the new board that is being established has no real authority, but in title XII of the bill when it came before the Interior Committee there were exceptions, protection if you will, for certain river basins. The Columbia River Basin and the Arkansas River Basin were in fact set aside and insulated from the operations of that national board.

We knocked out those exceptions in the Interior Committee. They were taken out of title XII of the bill. It was our understanding that they would be left out of the bill. But I find on reading the amendments that were offered en bloc by the committee last night, as technical amendments, not only did they add back prohibitions against studying, for example, interbasin transfers of water out of the Columbia River Basin, but also the Arkansas River Basin, and finally, a prohibition upon any kind of removal of water from the Great Lakes or tributaries to the Great Lakes, an amendment that was defeated overwhelmingly in the Interior Committee when it was offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CHENEY was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, my amendment would strike title XII of H.R. 3678. Title XII would create a National Board on Water Resources Policy, a step which I believe would be fundamentally wrong.

Creation of such a board would be against the interest of all States in the Nation, and would be especially harmful to the interests of Wyoming and the West. The creation of this Board rests on fundamentally unsound political premises, and threatens a key element of our federalism; State control of water resources.

I believe creation of a Water Policy Board is both unnecessary and undesirable. There are two reasons usually advanced in support of creating a National Water Policy Board. Some believe that we need a "uniform, national" approach to water resources problems and development. Some believe it would be desirable to increase Federal control over water resources at the expense of the States.

Let me say to those who support creating a National Water Policy Board because of the need for "a uniform, national" approach to water policy issues—both your premise, and your conclusion, are mistaken. I cannot see any real evidence that there is a need for uniform or national treatment of water resources issues, since the water resources needs of each region of the United States are fundamentally different in many respects. The States of the West have lived with, and together have dealt with, both their common and their unique problems for many years. Since western water supply problems are considerably more severe than those experienced by most other regions, it is hard to see why other regions cannot cope with their problems without massive new Federal interference.

In any event, it is not possible to create a completely uniform approach to water resources projects. The fact that many of the elements of such development involve unquantifiable impacts and subjective value judgments makes the idea of true uniformity a dangerous political myth. The person who cannot make almost any cost-benefit analysis come out pretty much the way he wants is simply not up to the usual standards of bureaucratic creativity.

For this reason, anyone who says they want uniform standards using such techniques applied to various water resource developments is kidding himself, or someone else. The fact is that water resources development has been, and will continue to be, a political process where public values determine resource allocations. So far this has been an effective process in the West, where resources are the scarcest, in dealing with the water problems we have experienced.

The cornerstone of the western approach to water resources has been the recognition that each State owns or controls its water resources in the public interest and on a par with every other State. This is also a sound national water resources policy. Such a policy is consistent with the best parts of our Federal tradition.

Even assuming that a Federal policy is desirable, the National Water Policy Board is still a bad idea.

The National Water Policy Board would essentially be a new standing executive branch agency, for water resources development. The current administration, like all previous administrations, has developed its own water resources review process to provide for full representation of Federal interests in water resources development. Today's process is usually referred to as the Cabinet Council to National Resources. I'm familiar with complaints about this Council—that it meets in private, and is somehow not representative of interests on water issues within the administration. The idea that any part of the Cabinet should meet in public is nothing short of astounding.

Moreover, the Cabinet Council was created by and with approval of the President. I assume it is still functioning the way the President intended it to, representing the national interest much as he represents it. The next President, whoever he is, ought to have equal flexibility in managing this process—in much the same way that if Congress wants to pass authorizations for water projects the President doesn't like, and has the votes to make it stick, it has a perfect right to do this.

The point I am making is a simple one: If Congress wants the water resources policy process to be an executive branch function, then the proper thing to do is to let each President organize it the way he sees fit. If Congress, in the National Water Policy Board, instead is moving in the direction of an independent agency to perform this function, it is difficult to think of anything less likely to produce useful results, since this is not a process susceptible to some sort of expert review but instead one requiring continued political judgment. If you like the way the Federal Reserve Board manages money, you'll really appreciate the work of a National Water Policy Board of this type.

Finally, a National Water Policy Board would be inconsistent with a central element of our federalism, State control of water resources. The fact is that one of the underlying forces supporting the move for a National Water Policy Board is a desire to place major new limits on State control of water resources. I am aware there are convenient disclaimers of such intentions found at various points in title XII. My colleagues should be aware, however, of two very significant points:

First, a number of members of the major committees which have considered this bill are concerned enough about the powers of the new Board that they have imposed statutory limits on the Board so that, whatever good ideas it wants to try out on the rest of the country, it will not try them out in their region.

Second, in very much the same vein, while the Public Works Committee is supposedly convinced that the Board was a good idea, I notice that the Board, and its statutory mandate, simply do not apply to the projects authorized in this bill. I repeat: The National Board will not have control over the 18 billion dollars' worth of projects authorized in this bill, many of which would not qualify under legal standards mandated for the Board. Is there a Member of the House who thinks that the Public Works Committee has failed to authorize in this bill some large Corps of Engineers project which should be built? In short the Public Works Committee is happy to let this Board block any future development in this area, which it likely will do because of its mandate, because the Public Works Committee has already proposed to build everything but the kitchen sink in the bill.

As a practical matter, the National Water Policy Board created by this bill will control all future Federal water resources development. In the West, by virtue of the interlocking control of land and water by the Federal Government, control of all future Federal water development is virtually synonymous with control of all future water development.

Throughout the country, centralization of authority over water resources within the Federal Government must ultimately lead to reduced power for all the States. This centralization is clearly undesirable. In fact, I think it is relatively easy to show that the Federal Government does a better job managing railroads than it would do in managing the Nation's water supply. We should preserve this element of federalism unless we are given compelling evidence that it has failed.

I urge my colleagues to ignore the alluring but meaningless label, "national water policy," and look to the realities of the careful balance of federalism which has served us well in water resource development. We should not replace successful federalism with Washington ineptitude. The President of the United States and a majority of the Energy Committee in the other body both support my amendment. I ask your support as well.

Mr. Chairman, the fact of the matter is we are establishing a brand new Federal entity to control water policy, we are mandating Jimmy Carter's water policy as the policy of that board, but we are excepting certain areas of the country from the impact of that board.

I think it is an extremely bad deal. I think it is extremely unwise. I think it is a measure that we will come some day, in the not too distant future, to regret.

If you do not have a water project in this bill, or if you have one that you would like to consider in the future at some point down the road, I think you can forget ever having it approved if, in fact, this new board is created.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 3678, the Water Resources Conservation, Development and Infrastructure Improvement and Rehabilitation Act of 1983. Among many other things, this legislation authorizes a new lock at Bonneville Dam in the State of Oregon.

One of the greatest impediments to expanded trade opportunities in the Northwest is the bottleneck on the Columbia River created by the current Bonneville Lock. Bonneville Dam is the oldest on the Columbia River, and its navigation lock is the smallest of the seven newer locks upriver. Barge traffic can back up 10 hours or more at Bonneville because only two barges can fit in the lock at one time. On the newer locks, up to five barges can be hauled in one 30-minute stretch.

The Corps of Engineers has estimated that barge traffic will match the lock's capacity by 1988. That's bad news for the Northwest, and for that matter the entire Nation, because of the tremendous growth in trade that has occurred in the Northwest over the past decade.

The export of grain represents over 50 percent of all the exports leaving Oregon. Recent projections on the amount of grain that will be transported down the Columbia provide ample justification for the construction of a new lock. While there have been year-to-year fluctuations in cargo volume, grain movements through Bonneville lock have more than quintupled since 1960. During the 1960's, Bonneville lock handled about 18 percent of Pacific Northwest wheat exports. With the extension of navigation up the Snake River, Bonneville lock has been handling about 45 percent of the wheat exports in the Northwest. Studies have shown that barge traffic will bear another 5 percent of wheat exports, accounting for about 50 percent of all future Northwest grain exports. Grain volume through Bonneville lock is projected to be about 7.5 million tons in 1990 and 9.5 million in the year 2000.

Construction of a new lock at Bonneville is not simply a matter of concern to those of us in the Northwest. While the Nation as a whole experienced a trade deficit of nearly $70 billion last year, the Oregon customs district recorded nearly a $1 billion trade surplus. Those figures clearly show that construction of a new lock at Bonneville is not only good for the Northwest, it's good for the country because it expands our export opportunities and helps close the gap in our trade deficit.

I also want to urge my colleagues to oppose the Petri amendment which would increase the reasonable and achieveable cost-sharing requirements agreed to in committee and would require local interests to furnish this money up front. If this amendment were adopted, barge traffic on the Columbia River would come to a virtual standstill and the Nation's entire inland waterway system would be seriously jeopardized. The Petri amendment is unworkable and grossly unfair to certain regions of the country.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Again, this is really one of the key provisons which has allowed those of us who have questioned our water policy process in the past to support this bill today. The creation of the new board and the review process for water policy and projects is merely an extension of the intention of Congress to provide for an independent water policy review process based on the merits and economic and environmental characteristics of projects. Congress has been committed to this review process ever since 1965, and has never backed down from this intention.

It was the administration which unilaterally abolished the water resources council, while Congress was working on legislation to renew and reauthorize the independent review process. The Reagan administration claimed in 1981 that its cabinet council on Natural Resources, controlled by the Secretary of Interior, could handle all project review functions. This essentially ment that we left all administration decisions in the hands of Secretary Watt, and now in the hands of Secretary Clark. The guidelines for project and policy review proposed by the administration virtually eliminated previous environmental and economic standards for projects and left the administration free to make subjective, policital decisions on all matters. Perhaps no administration would like its decisions accountable to outside review, but it is the responsibility of Congress to ensure that some type of accountability exists under any administration.

The new water resources board would be established of those Federal agency heads with the policy responsibilities as well a chairman and two other policymakers appointed by the President. Specific meeting and policy responsibilities would be laid out. This ensures that policy decisions will be discussed and not dictated arbitrarily. The provision also respects the requirement that States must also make important water policy decisions and, in fact, sets up a program for assistance to the States in carrying out State water development programs.

I should add, finally, that this title of the bill is extremely important to the environmental community. The water resources policy board is supported by groups such as the National Wildlife Federation, the Environmental Policy Institute, Sierra Club, Audubon Society, and others. These groups, which are most familiar with the problems that can be caused by unchecked or wasteful development of water resources, believe strongly that review and standards must be an essential part of the water policy process.

Again, I urge that the committee position be supported and that the gentleman's amendment be defeated.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take the 5 minutes.

The committee is opposed to this amendment. I think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDGAR], our distinguished colleague, has made a very good statement.

Let me say to the Members, what we are trying to do with this amendment is not take away anything from anybody. We want the states to have something to say about their water rights. That is the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KAZEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me understand, the gentleman from Wyoming said a while ago that by a technical amendment that was adopted on yesterday, that portions of an amendment that was put on by the Interior Committee, or a prohibition that was knocked out by the Interior Committee within its jurisdiction, was put back in with a technical amendment adopted on this floor; is that correct?

Mr. ROE. I do not know what the gentleman was referring to.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. CHENEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was referring specifically to section 622, for example, of the amendments offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE] last night which read specifically,

> No federal agency shall study or participate in the study of any regional or river basin plan or any plan for any federal water and related land resource project which has as its objective the transfer of water from the Columbia River basin or the Arkansas River basin to any other region or any other major river basin in the United States.

That is a provison that was originally in title XII, was knocked out when the bill came to the Interior Committee. We have jurisdiction over title XII. It would be our understanding, at least at the staff level, that the Public Works Committee would abide by that decision.

Last night in the amendments that the gentleman from New Jersey offered as technical amendments in a unanimous-consent request, that measure was put back in in a different portion of the bill.

Mr. ROE. We put the amendment up and the amendment was adopted last night.

Mr. CHENEY. It was specifically originally in title XII knocked out by the Interior Committee. We had what we thought was a good faith understanding that the Public Works Committee would abide by our wishes and, in fact, then last night it was added back in a different section of the bill.

Mr. ROE. I think the gentleman is mistaken. If we had made a commitment, we would have kept the commitment. That is for sure. We have never broken our word.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STANGELAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just want to point out that the amendment was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 3 days ago. So the amendment was not slipped in a package. It has been published in a public record.

Mr. CHENEY. If the gentleman would yield further, with respect to the Great Lakes, an amendment was offered in the Interior Committee by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING] to provide for exactly the same kind of prohibition with respect to the Great Lakes. That amendment was overwhelmingly rejected in the Interior Committee. And again was added last night, not back in title XII, where it had been attempted before, but out of section 1185 and a long three-page memo again is a major, major provision, obviously, that was offered as a technical amendment.

Again, it is more than anything else, it is simply a matter of what we felt was a good faith agreement we wanted to abide by. The point, more than anything else, is that if the new Water Board is not going to be detrimental from the standpoint of the interest of the various States in the country, why is it necessary to exclude the Columbia River basin, the Arkansas River basin, and the Great Lakes from the operation of that board?

Mr. ROE. Well, the committee had broken no faith whatever with the Interior Committee.

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McNULTY. I sat through that entire Interior Committee meeting, and technically everything the gentleman from Wyoming said is true; but it is further also true that there was a certain amount of fun and games being played that day in the Interior Committee. The gentleman from Oregon, with an abiding interest in the Columbia River, made the mistake of staying around long enough to have his amendment put in, then left, and to his distress, later that afternoon, and in his absence, discovered that what he had sought had subsequently been removed.

So I do not think there is a breaking of any faith, although the gentleman's remarks and his observations are technically correct, and the Public Works and Transportation Committee has made no such agreement.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the exemptions for interbasin transfer matters for the Arkansas River basin and for the Great Lakes area are news to me. I believe what I am about to say is probably news to the chairman and to the ranking minority member as well, but I would like a few clarifications on a related point.

Earlier last year this House passed a ground water demonstration recharge project bill which would affect the 17 western reclamation States. After the hard work of the Interior Committee and another authorizing committee—it was sent to the other body. That bill has moved through both the subcommittee and subcommittee in the other body without amendments.

Today as we approach the end of this Congress there are holds on that bill by at least two Members of the other body, one of them from Minnesota, in the Great Lakes area, and one of them from Arkansas, expressing various concerns.

I find it indeed interesting, frustrating, and irritating that, while we have more concerns and proposals, for interbasin transfer of water out of the Missouri River basin, we have these Members of the other body keeping those of us in the Western States from moving ahead with ground water recharge projects in the High Plains and in the 17 western reclamation States. Without any consultation with us, we have holds on the bill by Members of the other body on this important legislation, important to those of us who come from States in the Missouri River basin. And I add, the chairman of that Water and Power Subcommittee of the Interior Committee [Mr. KAZEN] did an outstanding job in moving that legislation through the House.

I would like to ask first—and I know this is unexpected, but I would like to ask the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Minnesota, if he is aware of what I just told him, first of all, and what explanation he might have for what is happening to the ground water recharge demonstration project legislation in the other body.

Mr. STANGELAND. This is the first news that I have heard of it, and I have no knowledge whatsoever of what the other body is doing or any Members of the other body are doing.

Mr. BEREUTER. I am wondering if the chairman can tell me from where the interest comes in the prohibition against water transfer out of the Arkansas River basin.

Mr. ROE. Well, it has been here for a while, and Members from that area of Arkansas have brought that to our attention. I think what they are concerned about is the situation that the water would not just be plundered, if you like, for want of better phraseology, at least that is their point of view, from Arkansas to go to another State without their joint relationship.

Now, the situation we talked about, the diversion out of the Great Lakes area, that was subject, as I recall it, to the approval of the Governors involved and also to the International Commission with Canada.

So those are Members who have asked for this kind of support, and it was voted last night.

Mr. BEREUTER. I am not critical of the Chair.

Mr. ROE. I understand that.

Mr. BEREUTER. I am seeking information at this point.

I would also go on to say that in the committee report language on the recharge bill and in the action of the committees in the other body as well, it was made quite clear that an interbasin transfer of water for those demonstration ground water recharge projects was not contemplated.

I wonder if I might be able to enlist some assistance and support in fair play and mutual concern about each region's water development projects from the chairman and from the ranking minority member.

Mr. ROE. Yes, we understand what you are saying. In candor, I cannot talk ill of the other body, I do not want to do that and I know the gentleman does not want me to do that, but this bill here that we have originated is a major bill that is going to affect the water resources of this Nation. We are hoping that when we get to the other body that they will move with dispatch, too, to get this bill through, because it is the only way we are going to get a coordinated program going on water resources. So we agree with the gentleman. We will work with the gentleman to try to achieve that goal, particularly where ground water is involved. In States such as mine, we are having a terrible problem with toxic waste disposal affecting our ground water supply, and I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania has worked very, very hard on the Groundwater Commission. People of this country have got to recognize the point of view that our ground waters are being poisoned hour by hour, and we have got to do something about it. So the gentleman is totally right there.

Mr. BEREUTER. I agree with the chairman.

I would like to have an opportunity for the point of view that I have just expressed to be emphatically expressed at the conference, particularly to those States who are interested in making exceptions against the interbasin transfer of water in this legislation. I would hope that those States might be a bit more respectful of the views of those of us who come from the Missouri River basin and from all 17 Western States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BEREUTER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STANGELAND. First of all, I want to say that I would be pleased to work with the gentleman.

No. 2, I would like to point out that on the 27th of July 1983, this legislation was introduced, and this is the way it was introduced, with the exclusions for the Columbia and the Arkansas Rivers, at the request of the Governors and the delegations that come from those basin areas.

If other delegations can come unanimously to us and request something without a big controversy, we can put those kinds of things in the bill.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. CHENEY. I do not mean to drag this out, but the fact of the matter is that the committee print, prepared by the Public Works Committee for debate here on the floor includes none of the exclusions because they were in fact knocked out of the Interior Committee.

So the bill may have been introduced that way last year, but we did knock it out. That language came out of the committee, it was left out. We thought it was going to come out and it was actually left out.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think to put it in perspective that Members should realize there was an existing law prior to this legislation being introduced.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BEREUTER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BEREUTER. I would be pleased to continue to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. There was existing legislation dating for many years prohibiting interbasin studies in the Columbia and in the Arkansas basin.

When the Committee on Public Works introduced this legislation, including the Water Resources Board, it incorporated into that board language restrictions on these interbasin studies reflecting existing statutory law.

When the matter was referred to the Interior Committee, those existing statutory provisions were included again in the Interior version and later stricken in the Interior version.

When it was committed to the Agriculture Committee, the provisions for the Arkansas basin were eliminated, the provisions for the Columbia were added.

Now, all that this bill does is to reflect the existing state of statutory law regarding interbasin transfers, and it did not initiate special restrictions in this legislation. It reflected existing law of many years' standing.

Mr. BEREUTER. Reclaiming my time, I would like to say to the gentleman from Minnesota, when he talks about consensus from within a State—and I appreciate that concern—I would ask him to remember, when he visits with his own delegation, particularly involving those members of the other body, that we had an unprecedented amount of unanimity in the 17 Western States on the need for ground water recharge demonstration projects. I would hope that the gentleman would be able to take that view to his own delegation as well.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. CHENEY. One final point, for the gentleman from Washington State. The prohibitions that were added last night on the Great Lakes are absolutely brand new. They do not exist in existing law. It is a major policy decision. It was considered as a technical amendment.

Now, perhaps it was, but it certainly was perhaps a substantive technical amendment.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDGAR] if he desires time.

Mr. EDGAR. I would just like to say to the gentleman that, as the author of the National Ground Water Commission, as someone who worked with the gentleman on issues relating to the Missouri River basin that dealt with coal slurry pipelines and other kinds of uses of water——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BEREUTER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. EDGAR. I think it is important for us to keep the Water Policy Board in place. There are some technical issues that we need to deal with, we think we can deal with them in conference. I think it is the feeling of the committee, the chairman of the subcommittee and the ranking Republican member, that we do need a National Water Policy Board, we need to analyze these questions very carefully, and I would hope that the gentleman could get some of his questions answered as we move along the process. But I hope tonight, given the pressure of time and space, that we could move quickly to a vote on this issue.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman, my colleague and friend from Nebraska

Mr. DAUB. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I will be very brief, I think his concern is expressed articulately, and I think his concern is correct. To this extent that there should not be exceptions carved out on a matter of this great importance, No. 1.

No. 2, since the Interior Committee took care of the matter, at least as far as this Member who is concerned, who is a member of the Public Works Committee, there was no need to fight that battle in the Public Works Committee. So, as a result, I think I am somewhat disadvantaged and a little bit surprised. I hope that it is resolved in conference.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANGELAND. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, let me commend the chairman of the subcommittee and the ranking Member for the work they have done here. I was not present at the Interior Committee meeting where all of this took place, so I am new to these arguments. But I was surprised at what the gentleman in the well had just said about what is happening in the other body to our underground recharge bill that we passed from this House last year. I was wondering why it was being held up in the other body.

Now that is a bill that this whole House went along with. It is very, very important to the entire country; not just in 17 Western States. But we are in dire need of new methods to recharge aquifers faster. The water table has fallen in all of the States and we need to find some new methods of recharging aquifers a lot faster than we have now.

For that reason, I would request both the chairman and the ranking member, when they go to conference on this bill or any other, assure them that we have cooperated with them, those two particular Members of the other body, and allow us to have that bill, because it is very vitally needed in this entire country.

We cannot live without ground water. Your section of the State, Mr. Chairman, and Pennsylvania, the rest of the East, has different problems than we have, but they are all related to that bill that this House passed last year, and I would urge that you cooperate with us the way we have been cooperating. There has never been any differences expressed between your committee and our Committee on Interior. As chairman of that subcommittee, I would sure request your cooperation on this matter.

Mr. ROE. Be assured of our fullest cooperation.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANGELAND. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Is it true in the gentleman's opinion that the allegation which was made by the gentleman from Wyoming, did your committee introduce an amendment in the guise of a technical amendment that repealed an amendment adopted by another committee?

Mr. STANGELAND. That is not true; it was not a technical amendment. It was a committee amendment that was offered.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman. It was one that was discussed with the other committee, I take it?

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANGELAND. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROE. There were 11 amendments that would have been offered under the rule individually to each title, in which everyone has open debate and full freedom to review and to discuss or do what they choose to do with them. We asked for unanimous consent to take the committee amendments en bloc and that is precisely what we did. It was agreed to by the House.

If our committee had made a commitment, we worked with four different committees on this bill. Every single commitment we lived up to to the letter. And as chairman of this committee, I can tell the distinguished gentleman categorically, there was no other commitment made to Interior nor would we abrogate such a commitment. That just is not accurate, and I do not know where the gentleman is getting that from.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANGELAND. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHENEY. Let me say that I have no desire whatsoever to question the integrity of my colleagues in the Public Works Committee, I do not want to debate this issue endlessly. I think we have covered it fully enough. It was a very important amendment. It says something as well about the establishment of title XII and the new Federal Water Board, and perhaps at some other time, I will the opportunity to pursue what I take to be an honest difference of opinion with my colleague from New Jersey.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee, I only wish to add in a very brief comment, so that my subcommittee ranking members on each side understand my feelings about this. I understand the battle was not fought on this issue in Public Works because this member understood the battle had been fought or was going to be successfully resolved in the offer of the subcommittee. So I did not follow and I will indicate to a degree an apologetic feeling for not having followed the technical amendments.

If we are going to perform title XII, my view is all right we can do it, and this member will not object, as long as there are no exceptions carved out. Now three exceptions have been carved out, and it is for that reason that I am hopeful in conference, if we do not pass the gentleman's amendments now, that the ranking member and the ranking member of the full committee take this debate into full consideration as we look at what we do in the conference.

Mr. ROE. We most assuredly will, I can assure the gentleman.

Mr. DAUB. I thank the gentleman for that assurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY].

The amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PETRI

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. PETRI: Page 317, after line 26, insert the following:

TITLE XVI—OTHER COST SHARING CONDITIONS

SEC. 1601. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law (including any other section of this Act), the share of the project costs non-Federal interests shall pay during the period of construction of any water resource project of the Secretary of the Army (including any demonstration project and excluding any project for navigation) which is authorized before, on, or after the date of enactment of this Act and for which Federal funds have not been appropriated for construction on or before such date of enactment shall be as follows:

(1) 50 percent of the costs of construction allocated to the hydroelectric power purpose of the project; provided that, the Secretary shall give preference in accepting contributions from non-Federal interests to those entities which are entitled to preference status under applicable law and have shown interest in developing the hydropower resource involved;

(2) 20 percent of the costs of construction allocated to the municipal and industrial water storage and supply purposes of the project;

(3) 50 percent of the separable costs of construction of the recreation features of the project;

(4) Not less than 50 percent of the costs of construction allocated to the shoreline protection and beach erosion control purposes of the project if the project is located on any shore (other than a federally owned shore or non-federal public shore park);

(5) Not less than 30 percent of the costs of construction allocated to the shoreline protection and beach erosion control purposes of the project if the project is on a non-federal public shore park;

(6) Not less than 25 percent and not more than 30 percent of the costs of construction allocated to the flood protection purpose of the project if such project purpose is for structural improvements;

(7) 10 percent of the costs allocated to the flood protection purposes of the project if such project purpose is for nonstructural improvements.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law (including any other section of this Act), non-Federal interests shall pay during the period of construction of any navigation project of the Secretary (including any demonstration project and excluding any navigation project for an inland waterway or inland waterway harbor) which is authorized before, on, or after the date of enactment of this Act and for which Federal funds have not been appropriated for construction on or before such date of enactment, the following amounts:

(1) If the project is for a general cargo port, 30 percent of the costs of construction allocated to the navigation purpose.

(2) If the project is for a deep-draft port, 30 percent of the costs of construction allocated to the navigation purpose of the portion of the project to a depth of 45 feet and 50 percent of the cost of construction allocated to the navigation purpose of the portion of the project deeper than 45 feet.

(c)(1) If the Secretary determines that the economic benefits of a water resource project are better achieved through flexible non-Federal cost sharing arrangements, the Secretary may extend the period for payment of the non-Federal costs required to be paid by subsections (a) and (b) of section 1601 for a period not to exceed 15 years beginning on the date of such determination; except that non-federal interests shall pay at least 10 percent of the cost of construction of the project during the period of construction.

(2) The Secretary shall enter into an agreement with each non-Federal interest to whom an extension of a payment period is made under this subsection to ensure that the present value of deferred payments when added to payments made on or before the date of such extension are equal to the present value of the non-Federal share of the costs of construction of the project which would be due during the period of construction but for this subsection.

(3) Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall issue regulations setting out objective criteria (such as regional unemployment levels, poverty levels, the non-Federal sponsor's financial capabilities, and the probable timing of future benefits resulting from any water resource project) upon which any determination by the Secretary concerning extension of the period of payment of the non-Federal share of the costs of any water resources project will be based under this subsection. Such regulations shall be issued following public notice and an opportunity to comment in accordance with subchapter II of chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code.

SEC. 1602. (a) The Secretary may commence construction of a water resource project or separable element thereof to which the provisions of section 1601 apply only if each non-Federal interest provides such asurances and enters into such agreements as the Secretary determines are necessary to ensure that such non-Federal interest will pay its share of the cost of the project or separable element thereof in a timely manner and will furnish any other required cooperation for the project.

(b) A non-Federal interest may pay its share of the cost of any water resource project to which the cost sharing provisions of section 1601 apply by providing services, materials, supplies, lands, easements, or rights-of-way or making other payments in kind; except that non-Federal interest shall pay at least 10 percent of the non-Federal share of the total costs of construction of the project in cash.

SEC. 1603. (a) Any agreement entered into under this title shall be enforceable in the appropriate district court of the United States.

(b) The Secretary shall deposit all payments received from non-Federal interest for their share of the costs of any water resource project to which the provisions of section 1601 apply in the general fund of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 1604. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the total of all obligations from general revenues for construction, operation, maintenance, rehabilitation, and renovation of navigation projects for inland waterways and inland waterway harbors of the United States shall not exceed—

(1) $586,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986;

(2) $551,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987;

(3) $516,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988;

(4) $481,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1989;

(5) $446,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990;

(6) $411,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1991;

(7) $376,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1992;

(8) $341,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1993;

(9) $306,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1994;

(10) $271,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1995;

(11) $236,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1996;

(12) $201,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1997, and in each succeeding fiscal year thereafter.

SEC. 1605. The Secretary shall study, in consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury and other interested parties, means to raise additional revenues in the event that total authorized expenditures for navigation projects exceed (1) the annual ceiling on obligations of funds from general revenues provided for in section 1604 plus (2) the funds available from the Inland Waterways Trust Fund. The Secretary shall report to Congress not later than February 15, 1985, on the results of this study along with recommendations concerning the most appropriate means of raising such additional revenues.

SEC. 1606. Nothing in this title shall be deemed to alter or amend in any way otherwise applicable statutes, including but not limited to Section Five of the Flood Control Act of 1944, relating to marketing of federally generated hydroelectric power from projects constructed by the Army Corps of Engineers.

Mr. PETRI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could inquire of the Chair whether or not we had taken action on the unanimous-consent request to limit debate on this issue.

The CHAIRMAN. No, we have not.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE].

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, we are trying awfully hard. Members are just trying to get home. This is a very important amendment. How much time does the gentleman feel that he needs?

Mr. PETRI. My understanding was that we would agree to limit all debate on this amendment to no more than 1 hour, evenly divided between the proponents and the opponents. It is my hope that we will not need the full half-hour, and we will keep some rough balance or parity between the two sides. But that was the understanding.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to 1 hour; 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI] and 30 minutes to myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering today adds a new title, title XVI to the bill to improve its cost-sharing provisions. I think we can see from the debate that has occurred today on a number of elements of this bill that we do need some reasonable economic tests of the need for Corps of Engineers water projects. My amendment addresses that need by establishing a policy that at least a portion of the non-Federal share of the construction costs of corps projects should be contributed by local sponsors up front during construction of the projects. I think that if this amendment were to be adopted, we would find that a lot of so-called vital projects would become less necessary the moment we ask the beneficiaries of those projects to help with the costs.

H.R. 3678 already contains cost-sharing requirements. In almost all cases, my amendment merely moves part or all of those existing requirements already in the bill, up front, so that the beneficiaries make clear commitments before construction starts. In the areas of flood control, recreation, beach erosion control and development of deep-draft harbors the same cost-sharing requirements as in the committee bill are simply moved up front; the percentages are not changed.

For hydropowered projects, half the cost sharing required in the committee bill is moved up front. At the same time, the amendment preserves the principle of preferential access to federally generated power for publicly owned and consumer-owned entities. For general cargo ports, the bill requires no non-Federal share, but the amendment would require 30 percent of the construction costs up front.

Finally, for inland navigation, the amendment implements cost sharing through an overall cap on general revenue expenditures, starting at $586 million and declining $35 million per year from 1987 to 1997, to an eventual level of a $201 million per year cap on appropriations from general revenue for these types of projects. Meanwhile, the separate Inland Waterways Trust Fund is going to continue to accumulate a balance of about $235 million it is estimated by 1987 under current law. By itself, a drawdown of that balance can fill for some years the gap left by the declining cap. In addition, the construction budget will decline steadily when clearly uneconomic projects are dropped. Therefore, no increase in the barge fuel tax or other user fees should be needed for nearly a decade, if this amendment is adopted, if then. The amendment simply puts waterway users on notice that eventually they will have to pay for the consequences of their decision at the margin, since the last dollars spent will be all theirs. Knowing that, they should become much more cost conscious from the start.

Another key aspect of this amendment is a flexibility clause for modifying up front requirements in hardship cases, and this is very important, because we have heard a lot about poorer areas of the country that cannot afford to pay their share of the project, and that is taken care of in this amendment.

In such cases, the amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Army to extend the repayment requirement for up to 15 years beyond project completion for all but 10 percent of project costs. I think it is important to indicate that that 10 percent of project costs need not be in cash. It can all be in kind, land, easements, studies, other local improvements that are incorporated in this project. So poor areas do not have to worry. They are not required under this to come up which the money up front. After 15 year, up to 10 percent in cash of their share, not 10 percent of the total project, let me underline, just 10 percent of the share. Certainly if the project is at all economically justified, it should produce some benefit to the area, enabling it to make that payment 15 years down the road.

Criteria for extending repayment to be used by the Secretary of the Army include regional unemployment levels so that can be taken into consideration, poverty levels in the area, the timing of future benefits from the project, and the financial capability of the non-Federal sponsor. This last criterion might be especially important for preference entities in hydro projects, since it is sometimes argued that they lack the ability to raise up-front capital.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is not to stop any particular project, but rather, to set the rules under which all projects can compete equitably for limited financing. Furthermore, it does not change the rules of the game for any existing project, or for any project already under construction, or for any project that has received any appropriation for construction prior to the time when the bill we are debating today becomes a part of the law of this land. Simply stated, this amendment is directed toward projects for new purposes, not at any repair, not any maintenance, or rehabilitation or modification work that is consistent with the original purpose of a project already built or in an appropriation. This amendment is meant to be constructive of good water policy and that requires a transition that is both fair and responsible.

We are not trying to upset any apple carts that are already out there.

Mr. Chairman, the sheer size of this bill argues strongly for the adoption of an up-front cost-sharing amendment in order to assist projects where the public need is greatest. We already have, it is estimated, about $10 billion of authorized and unappropriated projects, a $10 billion backlog of active but unfunded corps work in the United States, and this bill would add more than $20 billion in projects and related activities.

I know we got into a little debate in the full committee today on that figure, but the fact of the matter is, in the committee report itself they contain a Congressional Budget Office estimate appearing in the committee report which provides the total of all projects and activities authorized in this bill as estimated to be $22 billion. Add that to the existing $10 billion, and we have the $30 billion or so that I spoke of in committee this morning.

At the current rate of spending, not authorizing but spending, $1 billion to $2 billion each year is being actually spent. We are going to have $30 billion of authorization and $1 billion to $2 billion of money. That means 30 years for the one at the end of the road to even get its first dollar. Many of the projects in the bill will not even be looked at for more than a decade.

My amendment would give us an economic mechanism to help decide which projects to fund, and I hope that all Members whose districts have worthwhile projects in this bill or on the current waiting list will understand that this amendment will make it more likely, rather than less likely, that their projects will actually receive funds.

I just want to mention one thing, too. When I used to serve in the State legislature back in my State, we had trouble passing bills from time to time there, too. The custom in that legislature then, when a budget bill did not have enough votes, was to go around and ask members, especially new members, what it was that they needed to vote for the bill. A list was made and they were assured it would be put in what they called in those days a trailer bill. In exchange for that, they voted for this budget and the trailer bill was brought up and it would pass the body in which the member sat, but somehow it never made it into law.

I suggest to the Members here, we have a little more sophisticated mechanism. We go about authorizing an awful lot of projects, people work for them, they vote for the bill because the authorization is there. They are never going to get appropriated if we do not have a fair appropriation mechanism to let projects rise or fall on their individual merits, and that is what we are attempting to move toward in a very modest way in this amendment. I believe the adoption of this amendment would significantly improve the chances that the President will sign this bill, and that is an important consideration, too.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding at that point.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the gentleman for his amendment and draw to the attention of the House the letter that was dated June 20, 1984, from David Stockman, Director of the Office of Management and Budget. In that letter there is a paragraph that I think is operative to wanting what all of us want, and that is a sound water policy bill passed in this House, passed in the other body, and signed by the President. The language of the letter says in part the following:

> We have examined the package of amendments that you plan to offer and would commend them to your colleagues as a major step forward. If the House bill can be modified as you are proposing, the likelihood of a conference being able to produce a bill that I could recommend to the President for signature will be much greater. As the Administration has noted on several prior occasions, in its present form H.R. 3678 is a prime example of the type of big-spending, budget-busting bill that undermines confidence in our nation's ability to control spending and reduce the deficit. I would unhesitatingly recommend that it be vetoed if enacted without change.

I think Mr. Stockman's language is a bit strong, and I plan to support the legislation even if for some unfortunate reason the Petri amendment does not get accepted.

Mr. PETRI. I do, too, by the way.

Mr. EDGAR. But I think it is important for our colleagues to know that the bill, once passed by the House with all the fanfare and celebration, does not easily become law unless some modifications can be made with the administration.

So I think the gentleman is offering the House a good service. He is suggesting that cost sharing ought to be nudged up in a couple areas and that there ought to be some up-front help for those communities that have economic distress. I commend the gentleman for his amendment. I have some words I would like to share specifically at a later point, but I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. LUJAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to tell my friend that over the years I have thought that we ought to have some kind of cost sharing, but I have some concerns, and maybe the gentleman might make a little explanation as to his reasoning behind it.

Let me take, for example, in the nonstructural flood control work that might be done.

The gentleman called for a 10-percent cost sharing. Now, the gentleman also talked about up-front money. Is the gentleman saying that when a project is approved by the Corps of Engineers, a nonstructural flood control project is approved by the Corps of Engineers, that immediately the local government must come up with 10 percent of the money, say that project is $10 million, that that project, the local sponsors must come up with $1 million before it is even begun?

Mr. PETRI. Not at all. What we are saying is that they must come up with 10 percent of the total cost of the project, but it need not be all in cash at all. In fact, no more than 10 percent of their 10 percent in this case need be in cash; plus, they can even have that cash requirement waived if they are contributing more than or up to 10 percent of the cost of the project in easements, in local land or in other improvements, in studies and so on that contribute to the project, they can contribute that as their share of the project and so the cash requirement is no more than 10 percent of the non-Federal share and you can defer that in a hardship case for up to 15 years; so it is a very modest token of local involvement, and certainly there are very few projects covered by this bill that do not involve some kind of opportunity for in-kind participation, so we are not talking about all cash on the local already overburdened property taxes in these areas. We are talking about a contribution of lands that will be affected, that may be held in a State or local ownership and other facilities that may become incorporated in the project; so we think it is not going to drive out any but the most unjustifiable projects in the eyes of the people most directly affected.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield, let me use the same $10 million project example with a required 10-percent participation.

Now, what the gentleman is saying then that certainly the $10 million is the cost sharing, but that $900,000 of that could be in land contributions, in easements or other in-kind, and that as a matter of fact only $100,000 need to be in cash.

Mr. PETRI. That is correct.

Mr. LUJAN. That someone could get away with that.

Mr. PETRI. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Chairman, is this up front money that the gentleman is saying the local involvement, the local governments have to provide?

Mr. PETRI. This is up front except in cases waived by the Secretary of the Army, in which the case the cash would not be required for up to 15 years.

Mr. RAHALL. In a majority of the cases, it would be up-front money that local governments would have to provide.

Mr. PETRI. I assume in the normal case the local people would be required to provide up-front money up to 10 percent of their share, not 10 percent of the project; so if you have a $10 million project and the local share is 10 percent, that is $1 million. The cash requirement is 10 percent of that, or $100,000, and that would be the local share for a $10 million project.

Now, that is really not putting too much of an impediment. If you are going to get $10 million in an area and we are going to ask the rest of the people in the country to come up with $10 million and you have got a good property tax base and you do not have a low poverty level in your area and you do not have high unemployment in your area, and you want $10 million, we say, "Why don't you put up your $100,000 proportionately as the Federal Government pays its money?"

Now, you do not have to come up with the whole thing. You do have to match it with the government mix.

Mr. RAHALL. But in spite of this $100,000 requirement that the gentleman gave as an example, $100,000 for a local unit of government may be a great deal of money. How does the gentleman suggest that some of our hard-pressed local units of government in today's economic times are going to come up with this money?

Mr. PETRI. If I can reclaim my time, the fact of the matter is that these projects are generally entered into local what they call contracting parties. The projects tend to involve a number of jurisdictions, not just one community; sometimes, a State, sometimes several States, sometimes a combination of entities, and they negotiate that out with the Corps of Engineers in the course of getting the project actually funded and moved forward. If there is a hardship under this amendment, they could end up having that cash deferred.

All it does is make it across the board. This hard-pressed community should be delighted that if they really do have a need, they have an opportunity to get to the front of the line, rather than going behind someone else's 100 percent federally funded that is going to take the limited dollars away from them.

MR. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. Yes; I will.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I think that is an important point. We are making a major investment in communities. We are improving flood control. We are providing hydroelectric power. We are providing water supply. We are providing navigation. We are providing deep ports. We are providing all kinds of water assets to the Nation and all we are asking is some minimal sharing of the cost of that.

Many communities are not hardship cases. They can come up with up front money to get the kind of Federal investment that we are providing.

I think the gentleman from West Virginia has a concern because there are pockets of poverty and areas of real concern.

I think the gentleman's amendment begins to address that issue. It is not a perfect piece of legislation. I would like to see our committee come up with a formula whereby cost sharing can be provided on a fair and equitable basis, but I think that given the pressure of the gentleman's time, I would just like to commend the gentleman for an amendment that has I think broad-based support, clarity, and also helps these poor communities.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman, and reclaiming my time, I would just add that if a project is worthwhile and will produce economic benefits for an area, it ought to produce some sort of an increase in its tax base or economic activity in that area, or protection of existing property in that area, or existing rights in that area, such that they can pay their 1-percent cash requirement in 15 years.

I would just conclude my portion by saying that not only is the Reagan administration supporting this particular amendment, believe it or not, it is also endorsed and supported by Americans for Democratic Action, the National Taxpayers Union. I think this may be the first time they have seen eye to eye, those two particular people in a long time.

The National Taxpayers Union, the League of Women Voters, the Heritage Foundation, and that is another strange pair, but it is across the board; the Grace Commission, here is a Grace Commission reform that we can help to move forward; the National Wildlife Federal, the Environmental Policy Institute, the Sierra Club, the National Audubon Society, Friends of the Earth, Wilderness Society, Association of American Railroads, Comparative Enterprise Institute, United Transportation Union, and Railroad Labor Executives Association.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PETRI. I will yield, yes.

Ms. OAKAR. Did the gentleman say the Grace Commission?

Mr. PETRI. Yes.

Ms. OAKAR. Does the gentleman know that the Grace Commission, I am familiar especially with that part of it, one-fourth of their report had to do with Federal employees and they were 600 percent off. In one category, they were $13 billion off.

We have a GAO report and a congressional research report.

That is the most phony-baloney Commission ever created, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI.]

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I rise in opposition to this amendment.

I think it is important to note, one, that the title I section of this bill refers to port development and a section of the gentleman's amendment that deals with it tends to address itself to cost sharing for the small ports in our Nation.

I think it is important to know the history of this whole title I. We met with the port directors of the Nation. At first they were reluctant to deal with port development. We assured them that we would engage in a partnership and limit this development to the six major ports that are incorporated into the legislation.

The smaller ports were fearful and so were the larger ports. We finally convinced them to come along.

The provision in the gentleman's amendment would impose a cost sharing of developments in the small ports. They are not prepared to do that. That would be breaking faith with all the ports in our Nation, clearly.

No. 1, we are talking about a very complex situation. We had many hearings and many assessments of the six ports that eventually found themselves in this bill. We have not dealt with the small ports. There is no study dealing with the small ports to justify this kind of 70/30 cost sharing.

Let us go back in history. In 1789, the Articles of Confederation provided for the U.S. Government to take over responsibility for navigation and development of ports.

In effect we will be abrogating that agreement. And it was no small surrender on the parts of the then colonies because they were engaging in very substantial trade. It was Madison, Hamilton, and Jefferson who said it was important to establish a national network where we can carry via water the trade and the cargo of the day. And in return they promised they would maintain the navigation system and develop ports.

That is the way it has been up until this date. Now, what this amendment, this portion of this amendment would do is abrogate that agreement and impose on the small ports an inordinate burden.

Talk about the practical application, one does nothing in this amendment that confers upon the ports the authority to levy fees. No mechanism is in place, no mechanism is in place. Furthermore, you are talking about expediting, expediting the projects. There is no fast-track provision.

You will be confronted again with 21-year waits for any kind of development. And what you are really talking about, the question in a number of ports, you are dealing with 169 ports which carry one-third of the cargo. Contemplate, if you will, the inordinate distribution of the cost of the levy on the small ports. What it will do is impose an additional cost of transportation on all cargo into small ports.

Then look at the vessels that call on many ports within the country. These vessels have multiple stops. In the end you will, in fact, inhibit the whole trade operation. You will, especially in coal and grain, because we are dealing always on a competitive basis with many other countries. We will not be in a competitive position.

Clearly I urge the Members of this House to vote against this amendment. It is not thoughtful. It has not been given the light or the proper scrutiny. It has not been given the advantage of congressional hearings. It has not been given the kind of thought that the situation requires.

The way title I is found in the bill proper is the way it should be delivered. It is something that the administration wanted. President Reagan talked about port development in the State of the Union speech, and he is for it.

Vote against this amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Maryland [Ms. MIKULSKI].

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Petri amendment.

In 1970, the Congress authorized full Federal funding for a 50-foot channel project for my Port of Baltimore. As a condition to the State of Maryland, our citizens were to provide a dredge spoil disposal site for the Federal deposits during this project.

The citizens of Maryland were not as lucky as other ports that have their disposal sites provided by the Federal Government. Marylanders have even invested $54 million in our dredge disposal site in anticipation of our fully federally funded project. This site is called Hart-Miller.

The original commitment for full Federal funding has been breached. Congress is changing rules to 50–50 funding. So my State has been forced to give up full Federal funding. Maryland will reluctantly pay one-half of the total project cost provided for by this bill. But it is not reasonable to deny Maryland partial credit for the construction work undertaken in good faith as part of an already authorized project.

This bill will bring Baltimore closer to that day when we can compete in the imports and exports.

The Petri amendment would damage all ports and inland waterways ability to do this Nation's business. It would require local sponsors of water projects, like my State, to put their share of the project costs up front and virtually eliminate general fund appropriations for operation and maintenance of the inland waterways. The penalty for failure to comply would be closure. We, in Maryland, already feel we did this in building the Hart-Miller Dike.

Can you imagine closing our ports and inland waterways? The effect would be devasting not only to our economy, but to our national defense.

I urge my colleagues to vote against the Petri amendment, and vote for final passage of H.R. 3678.

If the Petri amendment passes it will have a devasting and negative effect on the ports of America. This bill represents public investment that stimulated the private sector jobs. It is the product of brilliant work by Chairman ROE that enables each port to be a world-class port generating jobs. And places real competition where it belongs in the marketplace.

Long Beach/Los Angeles will be the western funnel to compete in the Far East.

Mobile and New Orleans take full advantage of the Gulf of Mexico to send coal exports to South America.

New York, Norfolk, and Baltimore accommodate the container ships, that grow larger each year to carry more cargo.

I urge the defeat of the Petri amendment.

Save jobs.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH].

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I rise in opposition to this amendment.

As a member of the Energy and Water Appropriations Subcommittee for the last 8 years, we have never provided money on the basis of the fellow that had the most at home. We have provided it on the basis of need.

Take, for instance, a flood control program. Who is going to provide that up-front 10 percent; the people that get flooded? I do not think we ought to make this kind of a change in public policy at this hour of the night with a 1-hour debate.

I hope you will vote against the amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, the Honorable JOHN MYERS.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the chairman for yielding this time.

This amendment sounds attractive. It is tempting to vote for an amendment like this because it sounds like we are going to be able to use more Federal dollars and accomplish more.

However, the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH] is exactly right. Something like this may be the right course of action for this Congress to take sometime in the future, but only after careful examination. Tonight in 1 hour of discussion here, to come in and undercut this committee who has worked for more than 2 years to develop a new local government involvement I think would be wrong.

The problem is this, and the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH] and I serve on the committee that also examines these details, just as the subcommittee has, where the area of trouble is especially in flood control.

Quite often that is the area where they least have the money to solve their local problems, and the floods are not caused where the flood damage is done. They are caused upstream some place.

Who is to pay, then for the recovery? Who is to pay for the damages; the people who are the victims, or are you going to properly go back upstream? Under this Federal plan you make everyone pay for a share of it until we can correct the problem.

This is not the time, not the place to go in depth and to change the formula tonight. We ask that you vote "no" at this time on this amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WATKINS].

Mr. WATKINS. I thank the chairman for yielding and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is a divide and conquer bill, not against parties, party against party, but actually this is one that is the rich against the poor.

If this amendment passes basically, as the gentlewoman from Nebraska said, those who probably need the water development programs the most, those are the ones that cannot afford it.

I also serve on the Appropriations subcommittee with the gentlewoman from Nebraska and also the gentleman from Indiana. We have several thousand people come before our committee each year. I have asked several hundred of these if they could afford to put up front financing. I have had to this time, to this date, I have had not one single community or county or entity of government say they could put up the requirement that was necessary.

This would literally stop every water project nearly in this bill.

For instance, in some of the counties which have a great opportunity for hydropower, the per capita income is less than $4,000 in my area of the State, 22 percent unemployment, 25 percent of the people below the poverty level, 10 percent of them do not have inside plumbing. How can they come up with the necessary financing of hydropower, which will actually probably be produced and yield and serve somewhere outside of that individual county or that community.

This is a disastrous amendment. I urge every single Member of this body to do the thing that is necessary and vote against this amendment.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDGAR].

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to speak just a moment about what the previous speaker in the well said about the poor people in his area who have to pay for hydroelectric power.

The Federal Government has a deficit. The Federal Government wants to put in place hydroelectric power, wants to put in place deep ports, wants to put in place economic values to our communities, and that is good.

There is no reason why communities ought not to pay a share, whether it is 10 percent for those nonstructural flood areas, whether it is 25 percent for those communities who have generalized water projects or some minimal amount of cost sharing from almost every community. But every region of the country is important.

Who is going to pay the bill? States will make decisions as to what other strategic things they need investments for. And if there is a poor community in the State, the States will have the opportunity and the right to make an investment. And it is a pretty good bet, let us say we are going to spend $100 million on those nonstructural flood areas, a State has to come up with $10 million to get $90 million of free money from a country that has a $200 billion deficit for the foreseeable future. Let us say they want to put in place a hydroelectric plant that is going to serve the entire State or an entire region.

That means out of the revenues generated from that hydroelectric plant we can get recovery for that project. I do not think that is too bad. I think that makes the investment up front and it is a carrying investment.

Now there are two speakers who talked about "Oh, this is only an hour of debate and I cannot make this decision this late at night." We have known about this decision for weeks. We are the ones offering the amendment who limited the debate so all of us can go home and leave.

So I hope Members will take a look at the merits of the discussion.

Finally, this one point. Whether the Petri amendment passes or not, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE] has put together a bill that deserves our support. We have in this bill some positive policy initiatives. The Petri amendment just sharpens one of those policy initiatives to move toward cost sharing.

I urge strong support for this legislation.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. Let me close out the debate on our side for just a minute with this comment.

For over a year since our committee reported this bill unanimously, we have been attempting to get the bill to the floor. It is here on the floor. Two very important amendments were defeated, one very narrowly and one by a large margin. This is only the third issue of real significance, and it is a policy issue.

We ask each Member to look at it as a policy issue. You may agree or disagree. We hope you will vote your best judgment. Once this is disposed of, I hope we can move to final passage of the legislation, because we do, in this legislation, deauthorize projects, set up a revolving loan fund for urban water systems, and provide cost sharing and begin the process of developing a national water policy.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from New Jersey for his leadership.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the Petri amendment represents a broad effort to improve this bill beyond the important efforts that have already been made by the committee on the issue of non-Federal cost sharing. This is not a new or radical approach to water policy issues, nor does the amendment, in my view, represent unrealistic requirements on the part of sponsors and beneficiaries of Federal projects.

Briefly, the amendment would increase the local share of construction costs, which must be paid during construction of the project, in the categories of hydropower, flood control, water supply and distribution, recreation, beach erosion, and port construction. In fact, the provisions of the amendment on flood control and deep port financing basically track the provisions already in the bill, while the other provisions represent fairly modest financing increases. Finally, the amendment would cap, and then gradually reduce, the Federal appropriations paid for construction of our Nation's inland waterway system.

The theory behind non-Federal cost sharing for Federal projects is very simple. The idea is that the only ultimate test on whether a project is truly needed by local beneficiaries is whether those local beneficiaries will be willing to make a reasonable financial commitment to that project. Why should the taxpayers across the country invest billions in projects of this sort if the users of these projects are unwilling to pay even a fraction of the cost? Yet, time and again we have witnessed the construction of dubious projects, which are harmful to the environment and waste natural resources and tax dollars.

I realize that there are those who argue in good faith that requirements for local cost sharing could favor rich communities over poor communities. I do not think anyone would question my own commitment to the poor as well as the better off. But we have to look at the real world and the way that business is done around here. The fact is that we have built many projects in the past even in the face of substantial local opposition to such projects. We have built many more projects which local residents like and use but would not have been built if the users had to pay anywhere near the cost of project services. This is simply not the type of policy we can continue to afford in an era of $200 billion deficits and sensitivity to conservation and environmental requirements. They only true economic test which stands a chance of tempering the purely political considerations on these projects is the test of local financial commitment. We will never remove politics from the section process, nor should we. But we must find some workable ways of injecting economic and environmental realities into the water policy process.

In my view, the most significant section of the Petri amendment is the provision dealing with inland waterway financing. This provision would ensure that users of the inland waterway system would eventually bear a very substantial portion of the costs of the various waterway construction projects authorized in this and subsequent legislation. The committee has already taken an appropriate step in this bill by authorizing the use of revenues from the inland waterway trust fund for project construction. Revenues from the existing use tax should be recycled into the program. However, beyond authorizing money from the trust fund, the committee bill maintains the status quo.

Basically, the approach taken in the bill is that existing and projected revenue will contribute about one-third of the costs associated with carrying out the inland projects contained in this measure, while the other two-thirds of the cost will be borne by the general taxpayers. The approach taken in the Petri amendment is the cap and gradually reduces the Federal appropriation share of this cost so that eventually, after about 20 years, users will be required to pay for about two-thirds of the construction work, while the general taxpayer will only have to come with one-third of inland waterway financing.

It was necessary to craft the amendment in the form of a funding cap and reduction because creation of new, direct user fee legislation could not be offered on the floor during this debate. The amendment instead authorizes the Secretary of the Army to perform a study on all the issues raised by increasing user financing responsibilities. The most important of these would be the amount and type of fees as well as the input of system users into project selection and design issues.

As a longtime opponent of the Tennessee-Tombigbee Waterway, the biggest of all of our navigation projects, I felt a sense of responsibility to explain and promote the types of policy reforms in this area which I think would eliminate the need to appropriate vast sums for rather dubious projects. I believe that the types of user financing requirements called for under the Petri amendment will provide the proper safeguards against waste in the Inland Waterway Program.

Finally, I would like to address the claims of those who say that this amendment will gut the entire legislation before us. I think we should look at it the other way around. The rumblings coming from the Senate and the administration indicate that if we do not eventually adopt something like the reforms contained in the Petri amendment either on this floor or in conference, we are simply not going to get legislation this year.

I support H.R. 3678. I will vote for this bill on final passage no matter which amendments pass or are defeated. But I believe that if we pass this amendment now and then pass this bill by an overwhelming margin, we will send a message to the other body and the administration that this House is very serious about passing the most responsible and progressive water resources legislation possible. I believe it is a winning formula for the bill and I urge adoption of the amendment.

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I strongly support the Petri amendment to provide for increased up-front cost sharing by non-Federal water project sponsors. With the addition of the committee amendments, this bill authorizes over 350 projects and carries a potential price tag of over $19 billion. When you add that to the current backlog of over $10 billion worth of unfunded water projects, it is clear that there just isn't enough money to do all of them.

Yesterday we passed the conference report on the energy and water development appropriations bill. That measure contained about $1.1 billion for Corps of Engineers construction. At that rate, it is clear that the costs of the projects in this bill will rise faster than our ability to construct them.

It is therefore essential that cost-sharing requirements be set at meaningful levels in order to ensure that only the most cost-effective projects are ultimately constructed. Requiring some up-front local contribution ensures that local interests are fully committed to a project before we start sinking Federal money into it. Without local contributions during construction, the natural tendency is to rely on the Federal taxpayers. If a community can get a dam built at Federal taxpayer expense, it will—and the temptation to overlook alternative methods of flood control or water supply improvements will be irresistable.

Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment would be to make the best projects—the ones that can really pay for themselves—rise to the top of the list. It represents a real contribution to the establishment of a national water resource development policy based on merit and cost effectiveness, rather than on traditional, pork-barrel "politics as usual."

Mr. Chairman, there are those who say that this amendment discriminates against poor communities, ones that are unable to come up with the financing for these projects. In those instances where communities cannot contribute their full up-front share in advance of project completion, that contribution can be postponed. That reimbursement could be stretched over a 15-year period at the present value, provided at least 10 percent of the local share of project costs are paid during the construction period by non-Federal interests. This flexible, ability-to-pay clause is an equitable solution to this problem.

Mr. Chairman, there are those who urged me to wear my pig mask during this debate, in recognition of the true nature of this legislation. I am not going to do that, although I would like to. I don't want anyone here tonight to be wondering—"Where's the pork?"

This amendment would remove just a little bit of that pork, but will still leave Members with plenty of bacon to take home before the election. This is an important step forward in efforts to reform our national water policy, and I urge the adoption of the amendment.●

● Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Petri amendment. For the past several years that I've been in this Chamber, the House Public Works Committee has attempted to move forward and pass into law legislation authorizing new water projects for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. To date there has been no new program for the corps. In fact, the last major authorization bill for them occurred in 1976. Over the intervening years, the size and cost of this legislation has grown dramatically. The legislation before us contains some 300 provisions and according to the Congressional Budget Office costs some $18 billion.

In examining the present political environment that this legislation finds itself in, I fear that it is destined for the same political outcome—not being signed into law. With headlines such as "White House Unhappy With Dredging Bill" and "Water Bill Fought by Unlikely Allies" I would have to say that the outcome is at best questionable.

Why is this the case? The unlikely allies that the headlines refer to over the years have been seeking cost-sharing reforms in the water development program of the Corps of Engineers. This legislation, with over 300 provisions, will set the water agenda for the rest of the century. Unfortunately, with the absence of any serious cost sharing on the part of the beneficiaries of this program, the projects that are truly meritorious and truly needed will end up having to compete with some deficit dinosaurs that are part of the $18 billion package that is presently before us. These are projects that never should have been in this bill but find their way in for political need rather than from a national water policy standpoint that is based on merit.

The Petri amendment would correct this deficiency. It proposes to require contributions during project construction by these non-Federal interests as a way of ensuring that projects that are truly needed and cost effective move forward.

I would say that the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, David Stockman has said it best about this bill. He states in a letter on June 20, 1984:

> By attempting to perpetuate the traditional approach to water development projects, H.R. 3678 in its present form will extend the stalemate that has blocked new projects for several years. Its proponents may believe that by promising something for everyone, they can attract a majority. But with an annual deficit approaching $200 billion, "something for everyone" will really mean "nothing for anyone" if we cannot put water development on a sounder fiscal basis through additional cost-sharing and user fees.

For those Members who truly have meritorius projects that are economically and environmentally sound I would urge your support of the Petri amendment. The adoption of this amendment may well represent the best chance for enactment of a water resources bill in this Congress.●

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by Mr. PETRI and in support of final passage of this bill. I would first like to commend the full committee chairman [Mr. HOWARD], the subcommittee chairman [Mr. ROE], and the other Members who have worked so hard on this bill for their leadership and diligence in bringing this bill to the floor. This bill contains several worthy policy initiatives. I am pleased that the bill would fund a project to mitigate the continuing degradation of the Missouri River which is the result of a previous Corps of Engineers project. This project has been strongly supported by environmental organizations.

However, in this time of high deficits, I share the concern of the administration and many taxpayer groups that the funds authorized in this bill be spent wisely on truly needed projects. Office of Management and Budget Director David Stockman has written Mr. PETRI that Stockman would recommend a veto of this bill without the Petri amendment and that the amendment's passage would greatly enhance the likelihood of the President's signing the bill. I hope that Members of both parties will support the Petri amendment and I commend him for his leadership in offering it.

The Petri amendment would establish an overall policy of up-front cost sharing by non-Federal interests. It specifies percentages of costs which non-Federal parties must pay during construction. The amendment also creates a ceiling on obligations from general revenues for inland navigation projects. By imposing a type of market test which requires project beneficiaries to share a portion of the costs during construction, the amendment would give local beneficiaries an incentive to make sure that the benefits really justify the cost. Of course, in cases where local beneficiaries are not able to pay their full share of costs during construction, the amendment provides for postponement of all but 10 percent of these costs over a 15-year period. This flexible and fair funding innovation should help ensure Federal dollars are spent wisely.

I would like to speak to two concerns which have been brought to my attention. First, this amendment is in no way intended to affect existing preference laws governing the marketing of power from Federal hydroelectric projects. In fact, the amendment explicitly provides that, in accepting investment contributions from non-Federal interests, preference shall be given to those entities with preference status under current law. In addition, it states that nothing in the amendment shall alter laws relating to the marketing of federally generated hydroelectric power from projects constructed by the Army Corps of Engineers. This is a major concern of mine and I am pleased that Mr. PETRI has seen to it that his amendment does not affect preference.

Second, I would like to address the issue of the cap and gradual reduction in expenditure of general Federal revenues on our inland waterways. The bill before us contains no new inland waterway user charges and the Petri amendment does not impose any specific new user charges. Nor does this amendment affect any particular inland waterway project. What the amendment does is put a limit on the total amount of general taxpayer revenues that can be used on inland waterways for operation and for construction of expensive new projects. The version of the omnibus water projects bill reported by the other body contains a similar provision.

This cap on general Federal funds would be reduced by $35 million each year, and the difference made up from the inland waterway trust fund, which consists of receipts from the current barge fuel tax plus interest. Fed by the existing barge fuel tax, the fund will contain at least $200 million at the end of fiscal 1985. None of the money in the trust fund has ever been authorized and it is proper that it be used for this purpose. If the trust fund does not contain adequate funds to make up the difference, the Petri amendment authorizes a study of how additional revenues could be raised.

This amendment would increase the self-sufficiency of the waterways and give the industry an incentive police itself and to oppose unneeded and expensive new construction projects. By discouraging the construction of unneeded projects, this amendment would save the taxpayers money without causing the need for significant increases in barge shipping costs. This amendment would have no immediate impact on barge rates and would not cause significant barge rate increases even in the out years. Finally, should unexpected needs in the waterway system arise, we can consider additional Federal contributions at that time.

I urge adoption of the amendment in order that we may pass this bill.●

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia, the Honorable BOB WISE.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WISE. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DICKS. I rise in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. WISE. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment, well intentioned perhaps, but I am afraid at least through an area of inland water transportation it might bring to a halt some of the most important construction we are about to undertake.

I know in my area on the Ohio River, I am speaking of the Gallipolis locks. I am speaking of the fact I think it is important for people to realize in this legislation there is already a significant user fee. The Gallipolis locks will be built one-third from the inland water trust fund, a user fee contributed by tax on marine fuel. That is important.

Let us take a look at the Gallipolis locks. The fact is that these were completed in 1937, are the worst bottleneck on the inland waterway system of our country, bar none. They cannot accommodate modern barge traffic.

A recent accident at the locks shut them down for 17 days, and cost $20 million in various industrial revenues.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot afford to wait any longer. As I said already, a significant user fee will be devoted toward the construction of those important locks and any other inland waterway projects.

We cannot afford that kind of delay. We need to move coal, we need to move chemicals, we need to become competitive.

I am afraid the Petri amendment would do much to restrict that inland waterway construction. I urge rejection and I ask we get on with the business of building our locks.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to our colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STANGELAND].

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in most strong opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI]. There are serious flaws with the amendment and more importantly, it makes changes that will seriously impede the progress of vital water resources projects and directly threaten major segments of our Nation's transportation system.

At the outset it must be pointed out that H.R. 3678 provides significant reforms in the areas of cost sharing and non-Federal responsibility. Programs that have been 100 percent federally funded will, with the enactment of this legislation, derive significant funding from non-Federal interests. The provisions in H.R. 3678 were developed based on an extensive record and literally thousands of hours of research, meetings, and policy review. They go as far as can be reasonably expected without seriously endangering economic vitality and the very safety of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, we hear too much about the cost of so-called pork barrel water projects. And too little about the benefits that the existing projects have provided. Let me give a few examples. All Members know of the terrible devastation caused by floods and similar disasters. For instance, in fiscal year 1983, there were over $4 billion in monetary losses due to floods, and a death toll in excess of 200 in the United States. How much more would the flood damages have been without Corps of Engineers projects? Mr. Chairman, the flood damages in fiscal year 1983 prevented by corps projects totals $23.5 billion. Many of the project authorizations contained in this legislation would already have saved lives and countless millions of dollars if they were in place. We cannot stand in the way of having these projects completed.

In the area of navigation, nearly 30 percent of the Nation's domestic intercity freight is transported over water. This results in significant dollar and energy savings when compared with other modes of transportation. For instance, the energy requirements for water transportation are only 40 percent of those for the same number of ton-miles shipped by rail and only 12 percent of those shipped by truck. Yet, the gentleman would put an increasingly arduous burden on this already financially distressed industry. There are 1,800 companies engaged in commercial operations on waterways with over $4 billion invested in barges and towing equipment. The barge and towing industry employ some 180,000 persons in our country. This is an issue of jobs and economic survival not only for the industry, but for the agricultural, mining, and industrial users of the system.

I would like to point out just a few of the specific problems with the Petri amendment. Hydropower is payed 100 percent by non-Federal interests based on revenues from projects. The Petri amendment would require 50 percent of the project costs to be paid up front. Just who is going to pay this up front portion? Federal law—section 4 of the 1944 Flood Control Act—specifies how power is to be distributed from Federal projects. This act would have to be amended to change this. If non-Federal interests can proceed on their own and get the benefits, why would they share with the Federal Government without guarantees? That sounds like a pretty bad investment to me.

In all areas of cost sharing, the Petri amendment requires at least 10 percent payment in cash. This is the case even if lands, easements, rights-of-way, and other contributions are more than the non-Federal share. It could amount to a 10-percent additional payment than would be otherwise required. The gentleman keeps changing to try to correct problems with his amendment. Still, 10-percent cash is 10-percent cash. The gentleman portrayed limited effect of the amendment. In fact, his amendment had much more serious impacts. The gentleman was forced to modify the language when this truth was known. It still remains a flawed amendment.

The way the Petri amendment is drafted it would permit shoreline protection on private lands—section 1601(a)(4). While he may not have intended this result, it is an example of the problem of relying on those who are not as knowledgeable with the water resources program as Chairman Roe and others are.

Another example in the same area is the requirement for 10-percent cash for nonstructural flood control projects. Nonstructural projects usually involve the acquisition of lands and structures and moving people out of flood-prone areas. This is an innovative and beneficial program which should be encouraged. However, it involves almost entirely lands, easements, and rights-of-way. Apparently, the gentleman wishes to make it more difficult for these projects to proceed by requiring 10-percent cash. That would be indeed unfortunate.

The very fact that the gentleman has so desperately made changes to try to accommodate to the realties of the effects of his amendment shows, in itself, that the amendment is unfortunately not based on the kind of background that the bill itself has. I ask each Member to consider which approach he or she would prefer to trust.

Perhaps the most dangerous provision in the Petri amendment is the cap on expenditures for the inland waterway system. In addition to capping Federal expenditures, the Petri amendment would reduce expenditures by $35 million per year, through 1997. Based on the projected expenditures of the Corps of Engineers, they could not construct, operate, and maintain the inland waterway system for even 1 year with this severe limitation. Not only that, H.R. 3678 authorizes vital construction projects such as the Gallipolis, Bonneville, and lock and dam 26 in this legislation. Such a cap would further delay or prevent their timely construction. I want to stress again that the inland waterway transportation system which provides so many benefits throughout our Nation has traditionally been a 100-percent Federal responsibility. H.R. 3678, for the first time, provides that fully one-third of the construction costs of the inland projects will be borne by the users through the inland waterway trust fund. This fund is financed entirely by a fuel tax levied on the commercial inland waterway users. If you believe that this industry can bear an even greater burden of user charges just ask the farmers, mining interests, and other users of the system what the result would be on their businesses. We did not have to ask. We received exhaustive testimony during the more than 18 months of preparation that has gone into H.R. 3678.

In addition to waterway, coal, and other shippers who oppose the Petri amendment, here are a few of the national agricultural interests who are most strongly opposed to this amendment: National Association of Wheat Growers; National Council of Farmer Cooperatives; National Grain Trade Council; the Fertilizer Institute; American Soybean Association; Farmers Union; the National Grange; and National Farmers Organization.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is clear that the Petri amendment would go in exactly the wrong direction for our Nation, and I hope that my colleagues are not mislead by the high-sounding but misguided arguments for this amendment. This amendment could hurt, perhaps fatally hurt, the prospects for H.R. 3678 and the many vital water resources projects and programs it contains from becoming a reality. I most strongly urge all my colleagues to resoundingly defeat this amendment.

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will be gentleman yield?

Mr. STANGELAND. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

BACKGROUND

The Petri amendment allows reimbursement to be stretched over a 15-year period at the present value, provided at least 10 percent of project costs are paid during the construction period by non-Federal interests. This provision applies in instances where local communities cannot contribute their full up-front share in advance of project completion.

Although this provision appears to be a flexible, ability-to-pay clause, its effect will be to destroy the feasibility of many necessary water projects in rural areas.

I have a project for a dam and levee with a total cost estimated at $47 million. Under the Petri amendment the non-Federal share would involve a cost of $4.7 million.

The per capita up-front financing cost would amount to an assessment of $1,673 for each person in a community where the per capita income is only $6,384 per year.

Moreover, Lock Haven is experiencing a 14.8-percent unemployment rate and the threat of a major plant closing in the immediate future.

The Petri amendment would make the Lock Haven Dam and levee project economically infeasible because it does not take into account the low per capita income and the high unemployment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Washington, Mr. DON BONKER.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday the Secretary of Commerce told us that our trade deficit is projected to be $130 billion this year. The fact is that our domestic economy is no longer sufficient to meet our growth needs and we are in this very competitive world economy with Japan and other countries challenging our preeminence.

The fact is we have got to export more. In order to do that, we need an infrastructure something that is in place to support increased exports, like waterways, port facilities.

We are going to need to do this to enhance not only our domestic economy but our international economy.

As the gentleman from New York noted, Government has an obligation to do certain things. Waterways happens to be one of those primary objectives. The second point I would like to make is that the ports now pay their own way.

The Customs Service collects somewhere around $8 billion a year. If anything, that amount of money ought to be earmarked to help support these port facilities. All other governments I know of provide this important service for the local economy.

The last point is that the bill, as it now stands, I think attempts to treat the ports fairly. But if this amendment passes we are going to have a situation where the smaller ports are going to be discriminated against because the larger ports do not need additional construction for widening their channels.

But the small ports do require this service. In my particular area, the Grace Harbor Port needed a larger draft in order to accommodate larger ships to bring in products and take out products. If they do not expand their draft, that business is going to move up to Seattle.

I think we need both large and small ports. It does help to enhance the economy of those local areas. I urge your opposition to the Petri amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NICK RAHALL.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAHALL. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. PETRI. This amendment, couched in terms of dollar savings and cost sharing conditions, has the ultimate effect of further weakening and eroding our already deteriorated water resources infrastructure.

The gentleman's amendment, on its face, attempts to add limiting conditions on cost sharing applicable to all water resource and navigation projects. Those conditions have the effect of giving priority to projects serving the more economically privileged areas of this country—those with large and strong tax bases—to the exclusion of projects designed for maximum benefit to the Nation as a whole. The ultimate effect of the gentleman's amendment is that those projects most needed for economic development may never get built. Rather, non-Federal interests with the greatest amount of untapped ready funds are guaranteed more than their proportionate share. This type of insidious result must be avoided. Our policy for water resources development cannot be based on "More for those who have." Rather, it is our duty to insure that water resource development is designed to be fair, equitable, and just, providing the greatest good for the most people with a limited amount of funds.

The Petri amendment confounds that responsibility and further exacerbates the problems of water resource development. Its provisions requiring 10 percent cash contributions from non-Federal interests during construction plays havoc with local and State government funding. The ultimate effect—further cutbacks in the infrastructure.

What are the costs if we travel down this road—further deterioration, even greater future capital costs, lost revenues, jobs, and greater opportunity costs. When will we learn. We cannot afford to stand by and idly wait for others to act. If we do, we may just have to wait forever.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that the Petri amendment is contrary to our best interests. The existing amendment in the nature of a substitute to H.R. 3678 strikes an equitable balance for non-Federal cost sharing. It assures general cargo port development for the country as a whole but requires non-Federal cost sharing for those ports serving specialized segments of the shipping industry. It requires one third user financing of projects on the inland waterway system and establishes an equitable and consistent allocation of non-Federal costs for flood control projects. The Petri amendment destroys that equitable balance and substitutes instead an arbitrary percentage with upfront cash contributions.

Mr. Chairman, I would submit that non-Federal interests will find the Petri conditions too onerous and, therefore, be unable to comply. The final result will be a cessation of economic development and use of one of our most valuable national resources. That is not the course this country should travel and I, therefore, strongly urge my colleagues to vote against the Petri amendment.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address a couple of points that have been made by the gentleman from Wisconsin in his Dear Colleague statement sent to us earlier this week and also in his opening comments on the bill this evening.

He states his amendment does not cap the Inland Waterway Trust Fund, nor does it mandate that user fees be raised. I submit that it does indeed cap general revenues and as such creates pressures for higher user fees to make up the difference.

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to be honest with the American people, because user fees are nothing but a joke on the American people.

If, through enactment of this amendment, we find user fees are increased, we will find that the costs are indeed passed on to the consumer in the end run. The true irony of that situation is that Americans through their tax dollars expect the public works infrastructure to be maintained properly.

I submit user fees would be increased under this amendment and they are nothing but a form of dishonest taxation on the American people. The gentleman in his Dear Colleague also states: We need a fair way to decide which projects to build.

I submit we have such a fair way already, built into the congressional process. That way exists through our appropriations in this Congress. If the projects are no good, these funds will not be appropriated.

One other point raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BIAGGI], when he spoke of the expediting of permit grants in the committee bill, so carefully crafted by the full Public Works Committee and spearheaded by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE].

In this Petri amendment that I see before us, there is no such provision for the expediting of permits through which the Corps of Engineers goes about building many of the projects that are important for dredging our Nation's ports.

That, I might add, had the full support in committee of environmentalists on all sides on this issue, and it is a provision that we need to keep in this final bill if we are going to expedite the process through which the Corps of Engineers goes through permitting for port projects.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I rise in opposition to the amendment being offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

I am especially concerned with the cap on general revenue expenditures for inland navigation projects proposed by this amendment.

This is nothing more than a backdoor approach to increase user fees since by capping expenditures from the General Treasury greater spending from the Inland Waterway Trust Fund will be forced.

At present, there is a barge fuel tax at the rate of 8 cents per gallon. This tax will rise to 10 cents per gallon next year. The proceeds from this tax are deposited into the trust fund to pay for a portion of new construction costs.

Additional user fees will wreak economic havoc upon whole regions of the Nation dependent upon waterborne commerce.

But most importantly, user fees are nothing but a cruel joke on the American people.

All Americans are the direct beneficiaries of projects which facilitate commercial navigation on the inland waterway system.

All Americans are the users of this system.

Commodities such as coal, grain, and steel which are transported over the rivers are used by all Americans in a number of ways.

Electricity generated from coal.

Bread made from grain.

Automobiles manufactured from steel.

If user fees are increased, this cost will be passed on to the consumer of these products. And the true irony of this situation is that Americans, through their tax dollars, expect their public works infrastructure to be maintained properly.

To be frank, user fees are a dishonest form of taxation on the American people. We would tax them indirectly by increasing their cost for products made possible by water-borne commerce.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us today contains a balance between authorization, and cost recovery. This balance must not be tampered with.

If the gentleman is concerned that projects which do not deserve to be constructed may go forward under this bill, I wuld suggest he is mistaken.

While we may authorize them, funds must still be appropriated. There is no need for a cap on expenditures—the appropriations process will provide that check.

I urge my colleagues to oppose this amendment.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, just responding very briefly—and then I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL]—to the comments made by a couple of preceding speakers that was a lot of lamentation or complaining or worrying that there are Members who have the idea that their ports should be improved will have to pay 30 percent of the cost of those ports. That is a provision that is in the Senate bill which is now moving forward. But even more importantly, in our State we have a depressed area called Duluth Superior. My colleagues have heard of that. The highest unemployment and all that. There is a corps project going forward. It has been going forward since 1969 in the depressed Duluth Superior area. And do my colleagues know what the requirement is; over 30 percent local cost sharing.

Where was the concern? Where was the bleeding? Where was the effort to reach out to those poor people at that time? None.

We are just asking for a reasonable, fair, and across-the-board sort of treatment so we can prioritize these projects. We are going forward because it is a worthwhile project. We are paying our share because it is a worthwhile project. We think everyone should do the same.

I say furthermore that someone has got to bear the cost of these things. If you have to choose between the consumers of the benefits of these projects and the taxpayers, I think it is more reasonable to allocate the costs to the consumers of the benefits of these projects, at least in small portion.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention to speak on this bill until my attendance here was compelled by the gentleman from New Jersey. I think we all should have gone home a long time ago.

I came prepared to vote against the Petri amendment until I had heard this last little debate.

I share with the gentleman from West Virginia a concern for the inland waterway industry, which in my area is in enormously distressed circumstances.

However, looking at the Petri amendment I see that while it would indeed be difficult for that industry and probably would increase the user fees, that would not occur for a long while. It would force that industry and every other tin cup artist who comes to the Government for a project to be a little more careful about the projects that they seek from the general taxpayers.

I notice in here in the port development if you are under 45 feet it is all free on the general taxpayers, a tip into the General Treasury.

I do not particularly like the balanced budget constitutional amendment either, but I see it as the only way to save ourselves from us. I see the Petri amendment as the only way to save ourselves from us in the water project business.

I understand there are something like 300 projects at a cost of something over $10 billion in today's dollars in this bill. I do not think anybody expects that all of them or even a significant portion of them are ever going to be built. And, yet, our personal greed to put in projects and our desire to prove that our need in our areas is greater than others just seems to be overwhelming and more than the body can withstand.

For that reason, we need some discipline. We do not have it today. I think the Petri amendment is the only way to get it.

I hope it will be supported.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON].

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is with great reluctance that I rise to oppose this amendment. My colleague has offered an amendment that compels me to raise my voice in opposition. And I oppose it only after long and difficult reflection and despite my great respect for my friend from Wisconsin.

However, it should be emphasized that the issue before the House at this time is not whether we should increase the non-Federal share of water projects. Rather, it is to identify the most equitable and reasonable system of cost-sharing requirements. This amendment replaces cost-sharing provisions proposed in the bill or already enacted into law that I have become convinced represent a better way to accomplish our goals.

The amendment actually requires that we choose between the cost-sharing requirement of the amendment in preference to those included in the bill by the committee or already enacted into law.

Mr. Chairman, there seems to be at least two versions of the proposed cost-sharing amendment circulating. Since there is confusion over which version will be offered, I will contrast the cost-sharing provisions proposed by the committee in the bill or already enacted into law with both versions of the amendment that I am aware of.

H.R. 3678 as proposed and both versions of the pending amendment require 25 to 30 percent from local sources for flood control projects that have not yet been started or are newly authorized. However, version No. 1 of the amendment requires that the non-Federal payment include a cash contribution of 10 percent of project costs during project construction. The second version provides for a requirement of 10 percent of the non-Federal share in cash during construction. There is no doubt in my mind that the first version is a sure way to preclude flood control projects in far too many areas of the country. Proponents are absolutely right when they suggest this requirement will stop unneeded and environmentally damaging projects from going forward. It would also preclude projects of the highest priority and greatest need with little or no adverse environmental effects from going forward as well. Eliminating waste and protecting the environment are goals we all would endorse. They are the motivating factors of the sponsors and supporters of this amendment. But we must not vote based on an analysis of motivations. Our votes must reflect our assessment of the impact of the proposal.

The requirement that 10 percent of total project costs must be provided by local sources in cash at the time of construction is simply excessive. For that reason this version should be rejected.

The second version of the amendment would also provide a cash payment requirement equal to 10 percent of the non-Federal share. This cash payment would also be required during the period of construction. I believe this House should reject this requirement as well.

The bill already requires cost sharing at the 25- to 30-percent level. A cost-sharing requirement that would specify a cash payment of this level during construction places an unacceptable burden on the type of rural and low-income areas I represent. If we are already requiring a substantial non-Federal cost contribution, why must we ask for another pound of flesh and place an arbitrary and excessive cash requirement on top of the local match provisions?

In coming to oppose this amendment, I have considered the impact these requirements would have on needed projects. The need for flood control to protect life and property in the Kickappo Valley of Wisconsin has not been met for far too long. This project would not be subject to the new requirements, but the impact of the cash requirement on this type of project illustrates the adverse effect it would have. The remaining cost of completing a flood control project in the valley is approximately $18 million.

If the 10-percent local share cash requirement were to be met, the people of that community would have to raise $1.8 million for construction to go forward. Total tax collections last year for Vernon County amounted to $1,438,039.91. The cash requirement would be more than the total current county tax collections for all of Vernon County.

The provisions of H.R. 3678 allow the local share to be met by in-kind contributions. It does not allow a lower non-Federal share but it does provide flexibility to meet the requirement with in-kind contributions or cash. In addition, the committee's proposal allows up to 15 years to meet the match requirement and provides for interest to be paid on deferred amounts. As far as I know, both versions of the amendment would require the corps to issue regulations to determine when payments could be stretched out over 15 years.

I am concerned over the effect the cash payment requirement and reduced flexibility in payment schedules contained in the amendment would have on rural and low-income areas. H.R. 3678 provides flexibility to all projects to this type to satisfy the repayment requirement over 15 years. This is no give-away. Interest will be charged on all deferred payments. I find the committee proposal far more reasonable than the proposed amendment.

The amendment would also radically change the approach the committee has taken to require non-Federal funding for inland waterway projects. Most members of this body know of my long fight for environmental programs for the Upper Mississippi River. The battle to provide balance to our management of the river has been a long one and I am truly grateful to see real progress on this important question in this bill. Clearly, no one can accuse me of blindly following the lead of the commercial navigation interests.

Is the system proposed in the amendment fair? I have concluded it is not. For that reason it should be defeated.

The amendment does not provide for a fixed percentage contribution from the Inland Waterways Trust Fund, financed by user fees on fuel, to pay for future projects. Rather it caps the Federal general fund expenditures at current levels and puts those levels on a declining path reducing each subsequent year's level by $35 million. I think a fixed percentage requirement or some other formula would be fairer and would be better able to provide intermodal equity over the long run.

H.R. 3678 already has a requirement for funds to match Federal general obligation expenditures for inland waterway projects. The bill requires that one-third of the newly authorized construction on the Mississippi would be funded from the revenues of the Inland Waterway Trust Fund.

Non-Federal funding requirements must be further studied. We do not have the best alternative available for our support here today. We can have that proposal in the future. Even the industry has consistently testified it is willing to pay its fair share of these costs. We need a comprehensive review in the months ahead to identify the share of costs attributable to commercial navigation and to construct a proposal to reflect these costs and to ensure intermodal equity.

Mr. Chairman, I do not relish my participation in this issue. However, careful consideration on the best public policy direction for this country has convinced me the House should not approve this amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The gentleman's desire to bring the bill in line with the administration's cost-sharing policy by requiring more of the local share be paid in advance during construction, is well intentioned, but not good policy.

I have supported most of this administration's efforts to reduce Government spending, but when it comes to flood control and vital port and inland waterway projects, I have consistently maintained that they are legitimately and substantially the province of the Federal Government. This role should include the provision for substantial Federal financing so that State and local governments will have latitude to repay costs of certain projects.

Were it not for flood control projects, southern Louisiana might have ceased to exist years ago. Yet, despite the critical need for such projects, 95 percent of those projects would not have been built if they had had to meet the requirements for advance cost sharing set forth in this amendment.

Indeed, Louisiana has some critical flood control projects in this bill. One of the projects includes flood control construction along the Pearl River in St. Tammany Parish, LA—in my district—just north of New Orleans. This area has seen three major floods of record since 1979. This is a vital project, yet the local governing authorities could not begin to meet the requirements demanded by this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it would be safe to say that nearly half the Members of this body—at least 200—can readily find a project in their districts in much the same situation.

So, what if there were nearly 200 projects—critical projects—that could not meet the advance cost requirements of this amendment? Would they all qualify for an extension of time for repayment provided under this same amendment? And what if the administration, any administration, drafted guidelines to prevent most projects from getting on the extension list. I don't believe this is unlikely, for this bill alone authorizes nearly 300 separate new water projects. Under such circumstances, most Members and their projects would be out of luck.

While well-intentioned, Mr. Chairman, I believe this amendment is totally unrealistic. This bill is not pork barrel politics, and with the tough amendments supported by the administration, it's even less so. Communities with inadequate water supplies, which cannot meet the impractical requirement of this amendment, know the bill is not pork barrel. Victims of high water who are depending on many of the projects in this bill know the bill is not pork barrel; municipalities on the verge of bankruptcy for failure to meet the needs of its people would not call this bill pork barrel. They need this bill simply to survive. The bill contains some substantial cost-sharing requirements and new wildlife mitigation conditions and these projects are necessary and they are vital.

Mr. Chairman, I believe we as representatives to the Federal Government must accept practical financial responsibility for our Nation's water projects on the national level. The bill as written without this amendment accepts that responsibility.

I strongly urge a "no" vote on this amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WYDEN].

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to this amendment—an amendment I think will gut the bill, cripple the inland maritime transportation industry, hobble our farmers, and virtually end the historic commitment the Federal Government has had to maintaining our Nation's waterway infrastructure.

The gentleman from Wisconsin maintains his amendment is necessary to reduce the Federal deficit. But if we do not have a competitive transportation system there is no way we are going to expand our economy and reduce the Federal deficit.

Mr. Chairman, the Petri amendment is anticompetitive. The net effect will be to increase user taxes, which will put barges out of business. That would leave fewer users to pay the user taxes so that everybody left would have to pay more and more barges would go out of business. Eventually, we will undercut the inland waterway transportation industry, which will put our balanced intermodal transportation system in trouble. Competition will be reduced, transportation costs will rise, and the American consumer and the Federal Government will pay the price.

Let me also address the argument that this bill is a budget buster and, therefore, we must reduce the Federal commitment to the critical projects contained in this bill. I would like to remind my colleagues that we have not approved a single new inland waterway project in 7 years and we have not passed an omnibus water projects bill in 14 years.

Of course this bill, on its face, costs some money, but that is because we have forsaken our obligations for too long. Can you imagine the price tag on a defense authorization bill if we did not pass one for 14 years and then made up our minds to take care of it all at once?

Moreover, speaking of defense, I would like to make it clear to my colleagues that I consider a strong and viable inland waterway system crucial to our national defense and, therefore, a responsibility of the Federal Government. In a time of national emergency, we need to know that we can move goods—from high technology products to heavy machinery to agricultural products—fast and efficiently. We cannot do that with a second-rate waterway transportation system, and I'm afraid that is exactly what we will end up with if the Petri amendment prevails.

In addition, an efficient and viable inland waterway transportation system is crucial to ensuring long-term economic growth—the most important weapon in our national defense arsenal.

The upshot of the Petri local cost-sharing provisions, the cap on expenditures from the General Treasury and the annual $35 million reduction in that cap is that user fees will have to be increased. And, at this point, let me remind my colleagues that the barge industry is not receiving a free ride. Barge operators right now pay an 8-cent-a-gallon barge fuel tax that is then placed in the Inland Waterway Trust Fund, which under H.R. 3678, would pay one-third the cost of the inland waterway projects contained in the bill.

Let me be specific about the effects of the Petri amendment. The Army Corps of Engineers, in testimony before the Senate Water Resources Subcommittee stated that the $646 million cap on Federal expenditures included in Senator ABDNOR's water resources bill would adequately meet Corps of Engineers inland waterway obligations through 1986. But the corps also projected that it would need $44 million in 1987, $124 million in 1988, and $200 million or more in 1989 over and above the $646 million cap.

If we take $586 million cap included in the Petri amendment we would end up with the following deficits, which would have to be made up through increased user fees under the Petri amendment: $60 million in 1986, $139 million in 1987, $254 million in 1988, and $365 million in 1989. And it should be noted that the Abdnor bill only authorizes three new inland projects, whereas H.R. 3678 authorizes seven priority projects; so these are conservative shortfall estimates.

Next, if we assume that barge freight tonnage levels will increase by 5 percent per year—and I want to add that that is a very generous assumption—and that we will make up these deficits through increases in the barge fuel tax, we will see that the increases we face are downright terrifying.

To compensate for the shortfalls under the Petri amendment, fuel taxes would increase over and above the existing barge fuel tax by 7.2 cents per gallon in 1986, by 16 cents per gallon in 1987, by 27.7 cents per gallon in 1988, and by 38 cents per gallon in 1989. If one adds in the 10-cent barge fuel tax that will be in effect by 1989, actual barge fuel taxes could reach an astonishing 48 cents per gallon in 1989 to adequately fund inland waterway projects.

These tax increases are just unacceptable and we will all pay the price. One particular concern to me is the price we will pay in our efforts to increase exports and reduce our unprecedented trade deficit.

In the Pacific Northwest during the past several years 80 to 90 percent of the soft white wheat produced has been exported. Unfortunately, the strong dollar overseas has increased the cost of wheat and most other export products, further complicating the ability of Northwest wheat farmers to export their products. Predictions are that the Pacific Northwest could have as much as $600 million worth of wheat sitting on the ground with no market by the time the 1984 crop is harvested this summer. The last thing we need is the Government coming in and increasing transportation costs, making our products less competitive on the world market and, consequently, increasing our trade deficit.

The farmers of the Pacific Northwest and the rest of this country can't pass on the increased costs resulting from user taxes, particularly when they are involved in exporting, because their products are already uncompetitive because of the strong dollar overseas. The farmers of this country will pay for the user fees that will result from the Petri amendment, and every Member of this House who has agricultural interests in his or her district should oppose the Petri amendment.

If the gentleman from Wisconsin thinks his amendment will "help" the country, I would respectfully suggest to him that we don't need this kind of help.

If my colleagues want to see rich areas of the country pitted against less unfortunate areas, if they want to undermine one of the modes in our balanced transportation system, if they want to burden shippers, producers, farmers, and consumers with increased taxes, then they might want to support the Petri amendment.

I, however, don't choose to encumber my constituents and all other Americans with such onerous handicaps, and I would urge my colleagues to join me in opposing this amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PENNY].

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and in support of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Petri amendment.

If we adopt this amendment, we will be telling dozens of communities that we will not move forward on their flood control and other water projects.

We will be telling them that we will authorize Federal funds for their projects—but they may not be able to afford the local match unless you want flood control and other water projects to go to only the wealthiest cities in America—you'll vote "No" on the amendment.

Vote "no" on the Petri amendment.

Vote "yes" on the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I support passage of H.R. 3678, the water resources bill and commend the Public Works and Transportation Committee for its work on this legislation.

Throughout my district, the importance of this legislation is obvious. To the families of those individuals who died in the 1978 flood in Rochester, MN, this legislation offers, at long last, flood control for that city. To the farmers and homeowners of Houston County, MN, this legislation promises an opportunity to stop annual spring flooding. To the people of Albert Lea, this legislation provides a chance to reverse the decline of their lake and its wildlife. To the people of Winona, this legislation represents the final installment on their flood control project; a job now complete. To all residents along the great Mississippi River, this legislation embodies policies to preserve the environment, wildlife habitat, and recreational opportunities of the upper Mississippi. And to southeastern Minnesota farmers, this legislation will help break the bottleneck of barges moving down the Mississippi to the gulf ports.

A careful look at the projects in this bill demonstrates that this legislation is an investment in the protection of life and property, the continued flow of commerce, and the preservation of our natural water resources.

More than one-third of the city of Rochester, MN, a city of approximately 60,000 people, lies within the flood plain of the South Fork Zumbro River. Over 2,000 homes, 200 businesses, 21 industries, and 10 public buildings are subject to flooding, current estimates for potential property damage exceed $100 million, major floods have occurred there three times during the last 21 years, five lives were lost in 1978 with damages in excess of $58 million. The Corps of Engineers is prepared to begin immediate construction of this project. Indeed, it is eager to do so. The corps, and citizens of Rochester, have awaited authorization for many years.

The Root River, located in southeastern Minnesota flows through Houston County, rich with agricultural land and small communities, flooding occurs at least once a year, usually during spring thaws, bringing destruction to homes and farmland. The problems are compounded by erosion and a decline in water quality. The Root River basin project, authorized by this bill, will reduce annual flood damage by 86 percent and reduce the disruption of community life for 340 households and 76 businesses.

Albert Lea Lake in Freeborn County, MN, was once clean and abundant with fish. In recent years, advanced eutrophication of the lake had resulted in severe algae blooms, scum, noxious odors, and a decline in the quantity and quality of fish. This has not only drastically reduced the recreational use of the lake but is a possible danger to the public health. This legislation authorizes a demonstration project to restore the lake at an economically feasible level. The information and experience gained at Albert Lea Lake will be invaluable in improving the environmental quality of lakes in similar decline throughout the United States.

In 1971, the Corps of Engineers began construction of a flood control project at Winona, MN, located on the Mississippi River. The city was informed of its obligations under this project at that time. The city raised its local share and made all appropriate contributions. Then in 1975, the corps changed its protective flood dike standards and informed the city it would now be responsible for an additional cost of bridgework, previously not ordered. This bill restores some fairness to the issue of local share by requiring this new project work ordered by the corps to be at Federal expense.

The Upper Mississippi River Basin is one of America's most valuable natural resources. It is not only a key navigation system for commercial transportation; it is a nationally significant ecosystem, providing fish and wildlife refuge. The water resources act provides for the coordinated planning of projects on the upper Mississippi to assure the preservation and enhancement of the environmental, recreational and navigational benefits of this national resource. It will authorize long-term resource monitoring, habitat rehabilitation and enhancement, recreational improvements and studies, traffic monitoring and computerized inventory analysis for management of the river system as part of the comprehensive locks and dam 26 construction authorization.

Mr. Chairman, these projects return a benefit to this country far in excess of the costs involved. Congress has waited many years to take action on the crisis facing our water resources. I urge passage of this legislation.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALLON].

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes to close debate.

Mr. Chairman, we are trying our very best to get the Members on their planes.

Again we have to deal in facts. The distinguished gentleman from Minnesota made a comment that it was for free under 45 feet in dredging.

We have established a trust fund and the trust fund is the moneys that come from the customs receipts that the ships create.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

If the gentleman would read the bill, it does not come from customs trust funds.

Mr. ROE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I know what is in the bill.

Mr. FRENZEL. It says an amount equivalent to the amount of money collected in customs duties or $2 billion, whichever is greater. It does not say that it will come from customs money.

Mr. ROE. Well, that is in the intent then.

Mr. FRENZEL. If that were the intent, you would have to cede jurisdiction of the bill to another committee.

Mr. ROE. Oh, no. We had this discussion with the Ways and Means Committee already. That is a matter of fact. Because we cleared it.

Mr. GIBBONS. If the gentleman would yield to me, we did clear it up.

Mr. ROE. That is exactly correct. So, it is in the bill.

There are two things and I want the Members to just think about this.

First of all, the myth that there is not upfront money is just not correct. We provide in the bill lands, easements, rights-of-ways and we are not charging people up to 25 percent in any new project.

So that idea that people are getting a free ride is just not true.

The second thing I want to call to the Members' attention and to those who have inland ports. There is a cap being placed on this particular function and if that cap goes on, that is going to materially slow down the construction of the locks and dams in this country.

So I am not going to belabor this. I would really urge my colleagues to vote "no" on this amendment. We have carefully crafted the entire bill. We have gone more than 60 percent with the administration in upfront funding and funding of these programs.

I would ask my colleagues to vote against this Petri amendment and let us get on with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI].

The question was taken and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 85, noes 213, not voting 135, as follows:

● Mr. HUGHES. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I am pleased to rise in support of H.R. 3678, the Water Resources Development Act of 1984. I wish to congratulate the House Public Works Committee for once again developing legislation which is job intensive, and which will provide so many economic benefits to our Nation.

Committee Chairman JIM HOWARD and Subcommittee Chairman BOB ROE, my good friends and colleagues from New Jersey, are well respected for their leadership in developing programs which put people to work. I wish to commend them along with the ranking minority members, GENE SNYDER of Kentucky and ARLAN STANGELAND of Minnesota, for their outstanding efforts in drafting this important legislation.

H.R. 3678 would authorize the construction of some 300 Federal water projects around the country at an estimated cost of $12 billion. As enormous as those numbers seem, they barely scratch the surface of our overall need to maintain and improve our nation's ports, rivers and coastal resources.

Over the last few decades, we have experienced a very tragic deterioration in many aspects of our Nation's infrastructure, including roads, bridges, energy and water-related projects. This has cost us countless jobs and impacted all segments of our economy, from agriculture to manufacturing and tourism. It is obviously going to cost a lot to rebuild our infrastructure, but it is an investment which the Federal Government has to make.

There are some areas of the country where the local economy is particularly dependent upon water-related resources. This includes my district in southern New Jersey, where our many miles of beaches and island waterways are the foundation of a multibillion dollar tourism industry which is the second largest industry in our State. We are very fortunate to possess these beautiful natural resources, and we are grateful for the cooperation which the Federal Government has provided over the years in maintaining them.

Unfortunately, the cost of maintaining these resources is continuing to escalate. Many of our seashore communities, which have relatively small year-round populations, are now spending large percentages of their local budgets on shore protection activities. Despite a major commitment from the State, which has done an excellent job of identifying and supporting our coastal programs, we are losing ground every year in the battle to keep our waterways navigable and our beaches intact. Our State and local governments can not do the job alone. The Federal Government must remain an active partner in our shore protection activities. That is precisely what H.R. 3678 would provide.

After many hours of hearings and reviews, the Public Works Committee identified those 300 or so energy and water projects around the country which have the highest priority for construction. Included in this list are a dozen projects in southern New Jersey which I have had the privilege of sponsoring over the years.

There are many other projects in my district which I would have liked included in the legislation. However, with a $200 billion budget deficit staring us in the face, it is simply not possible to move ahead with every project on the books at this time. Accordingly, I had urged the committee during my testimony to support only those projects in my district which have the highest priority for creating or protecting jobs, or in the case of flood control projects, for protecting lives and property. I am very grateful to the committee for considering my requests and including these projects in its bill.

I am especially pleased that the legislation includes the proposed Beach Restoration and Storm Protection Program from Cape May Inlet to lower township. This is a mitigation project designed to restore the damage caused by the Federal Government's construction of the Cold Spring jetties in 1911. These jetties disrupted the normal littoral drift and starved the beaches in Cape May City, robbing this famous seaside resort of its most precious natural asset—its beaches.

The residents and business community in Cape May have waited patiently for many years for the Federal Government to repay its debt by restoring these beaches, which are the mainstay of the local economy. In the meantime, the beach erosion has steadily worsened to the point where the nearby Coast Guard Training Center has been breached. This is the only Coast Guard Training Center in the country, and we are in danger of losing portions of this multimillion-dollar facility to the ocean in the next few years. The project included in H.R. 3678 is designed to stabilize the beaches in Cape May City, as well as provide badly needed storm protection farther south in Lower Township and Cape May Point. I appreciate the committee's support of this project, which is so important to Cape May County.

There are also four navigation projects in Cape May County included in the bill, involving Corsons, Great Egg Harbor, Hereford, and Townsends Inlets. These projects were designed by the Army Corps of Engineers in the 1960's to help stabilize the beaches and keep these inlets open for commercial fishermen and recreational boaters. I will be working closely with the State and local governments to ensure their support of these projects, including their willingness to commit the necessary matching funds for construction. These inlets are vital to the economy of the area communities, and I am hopeful that we will be able to put together the necessary combination of Federal, State, and local financial support to stabilize these important inlets.

Also included in the bill are demonstration flood control projects in six small communities along the Delaware Bay. They are: Fort Elfsborg, Sea Breeze, Gandys Beach, Fortescue, Reeds Beach, and Pierces Point. All six communities are extremely vulnerable to storms, but because of their small populations, they have been unable to qualify for traditional flood control assistance.

This bill would authorize the construction of specially designed, low-cost flood control projects in each of these communities. Hopefully, these projects will demonstrate the viability of using innovative flood control techniques, so that similar projects can be developed for other communities along the Delaware Bay and around the country which experience flooding problems.

The final project included in this bill from my district is the proposed construction of a new south jetty in Barnegat Inlet. This jetty is needed to help remove the serious navigational hazards which threatened the safety of boaters using this busy waterway. This project has just been approved for construction funding by the House and Senate under the energy and water development appropriations bill, following its certification as a design deficiency. The Barnegat Inlet project was originally included in H.R. 3678 because we were uncertain if it would be certified as a design deficiency or not. I am very pleased that construction of this jetty will be moving ahead as soon as the energy and water appropriations bill is signed into law.

Mr. Chairman, it has been 7 years since a water resources development bill was last signed into law. During that period, hundreds of important energy and water development projects around the country have backed up awaiting authorization. H.R. 3678 will enable us to end this construction drought and move forward with projects that employ millions of Americans and help keep our economy strong. It is a good bill and I urge my colleagues to support it. Thank you.●

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3678, the Water Resources Conservation Development, and Infrastructure Improvement and Rehabilitation Act of 1983. This legislation contains several provisions affecting projects in my district, but none more important than the deauthorization of the Lincoln School Dam. With passage of this legislation, both components of the Dickey-Lincoln School hydroelectric project on the St. John River will finally be deauthorized. I am pleased to have been active in the deauthorization of both the Dickey Dam and the Lincoln School Dam.

First authorized by the Flood Control Act of 1965 (Public Law 89-298), the Dickey-Lincoln School project has had a long and controversial history. Due to environmental and economic considerations, the Dickey portion was deauthorized in 1981 by Public Law 97-128, which incorporated deauthorizing legislation that I had first introduced in 1979. In exchange, a compromise was developed which retained the Lincoln School, subject to further economic review. Language directing the corps to determine the economic and financial feasibility of constructing the Lincoln School project without the larger upstream Dickey Dam was included in the conference report to the fiscal year 1982 Energy and Water Development Appropriations Act (Public Law 97-88).

The June 1983 report of the corps' New England Division has been through an exhaustive review process by the corps' Washington office. The report is now pending final review by the Office of Management and Budget, and, once approved, will be sent to the appropriate congressional committees. While it is unfortunate that this process has taken over a year, I am confident that the OMB review will uphold the final report's assessment that no further study of the project is recommended.

Specifically, the June 1983 report concludes that hydroelectric power generated by Lincoln School cannot be marketed at a rate sufficient to repay production and distribution costs. The project, therefore, does not meet the Federal prerequisite requirements for financial feasibility. In determining the economic feasibility of the project, the corps found that Lincoln School power could be sold competitively in the future if energy costs from coal and oil-fired plants escalate. However, its feasibility would be severely jeopardized by the introduction of Canadian Hydro-Quebec power into the NEPOOL system. Since the report was issued last June, Hydro-Quebec signed an 11-year agreement with the New England States and New York to buy Hydro-Quebec's excess power. Thus, the economic feasibility is even worse than originally determined last June.

Although Congress requested the corps to study only the economic and financial feasibility of the Lincoln School project, the report does include socioeconomic and environmental data which I would like to highlight briefly.

Depending on the type of dam constructed, 60-to-140 year-round households in St. Francis and Allagash would have to be relocated. The influx of new workers and their families would increase demand on local services and housing. Existing limitations on solid waste disposal capabilities, educational facilities and health and medical services would be burdened by this population increase.

Creation of the reservoir would inundate up to 1,368 acres, affecting soft and hardwood stands and animal species. The effect on wildlife would be proportional to the acres of inundated habitat. Upon inundation, wildlife would perish or move to adjacent lands, where the survivors would compete for available habitat. The deer wintering habitat is of particular concern, and the furbish lousewort, a federally listed endangered species, might be harmed by inundation.

Creation of a reservoir would eliminate stream canoeing and stream fishing along certain areas of the St. John River, and hunting opportunities would be reduced by loss of habitat. Finally, about three primitive camp sites would be flooded out, and a maximum of two prehistoric archaeological sites eligible for inclusion in the National Register of Historic Places would be destroyed or heavily damaged.

I am pleased that the final deauthorization of Lincoln School is included in this legislation, and I hope that the Senate will act promptly in ending further Federal involvement in this project.●

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, for the second time this week I rise to commend the efforts of Representative HOWARD, chairman of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, Representative ROE, chairman of the Subcommittee on Water Resources and the ranking Republican members of the committee for their tireless work on H.R. 3678, the Water Resources Conservation, Development, and Infrastructure Improvement and Rehabilitation Act of 1983.

It is well known that this bill represents the first major authorization for new water projects since 1976 with the last true construction authorization enacted in 1970. This bill, introduced after almost 2 years of exhaustive hearings in which 486 witnesses testified, represents a broad consensus of our Nation's water resource needs. The cost-sharing reforms included in H.R. 3678 move the price of federally subsidized water programs much closer to their real economic value, representing a major achievement of this measure. The new authorizations included will repair the Nation's inland waterway facilities, new and modern port channels, and provide for construction of flood control and other sorely needed water related projects.

H.R. 3678 also contains several provisions that are particularly important to my own home State of Massachusetts. The first is the Town Brook flood control project which has been studied by the Army Corps of Engineers and will prevent an estimated $2.1 million worth of damage annually in Quincy and Braintree, MA. Title V contains an authorization for dredging the Neponset River from the Milton Town Landing to Port Norfolk, MA. This project will provide for commercial and recreational use of the Neponset River and adjacent Dorchester Bay.

Last, title VIII contains a water supply loan for the city of Boston to maintain and replace the badly decayed piping system that is indicative of the older cities in the Northeast. Also included in the committee amendment under title VIII is a water supply loan for Brockton, MA, to implement a Brockton Area Water Development Program.●

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to commend the distinguished chairman of the Water Resources Subcommittee, Mr. ROE, for inclusion of a water supply loan for Brockton, MA, under title VIII of H.R. 3678 in the committee's amendment.

Brockton is a city with a population of 110,000 people located in the 11th Congressional District which I have the honor to represent. The water supply problems plaguing Brockton symbolize the true need for the legislation before us today.

For the better part of this century, Brockton enjoyed a trouble-free water supply as did most of the towns and cities across the Nation. However, a rapid growth in population and expansion of industry taxed the area's water resources to the point where Brockton has been teetering on the dangerous edge of being unable to supply safe, drinkable water to its citizens.

The danger of Brockton's water problems became all to clear during the summer of 1981 when a drought forced city officials to impose a complete water ban for 8 weeks. Water supply projections indicate a future demand on the Brockton system of 20 million gallons per day by the year 2020. Present sources provide Brockton with 9.5 million gallons per day during moderate weather, indicating a potentially serious water shortfall in the near future if alternative sources are not developed.

The city has been hard at work in its efforts to avoid this disaster and has produced a viable, cost effective water development program. The program utilizes a two pronged approach that will revitalize the Avon Reservoir and create a new reservoir in Kingston, MA.

The Avon Reservoir, adjacent to the northern Brockton city limits, was utilized by the city for many years without treatment and produced safe drinking water for the city at a rate of 1.5 million gallons per day. During the 1981 drought, the reservoir was unusable because of contamination from local, identifiable sources. The loss of this resource as a safe water supply was the major contributor to Brockton's problems at the time. Its revitalization through the construction of a treatment facility will provide a renewed and reliable flow of water to the city.

The creation of a reservoir in Kingston is estimated to produce an immediate increase of 2 million gallons per day. This water would be pumped into existing storage facilities located on Silver Lake, currently Brockton's main water supply source. The availability of this new water resource under the development plan would enhance the environmental stability of the entire supply system and increase the safe yield of water for public consumption.

Mr. Chairman, these Brockton water projects are exemplary of the type for which the Water Supply Loan Program was created. Their completion will mean a sure and steady supply of water to Brockton for years to come.●

First, many of us from Northeast have been trying for years to bring better balance to water resource policy. In our view, we have seen money drained away from the older areas of the country to the West and Southwest for too long. The Northeast makes up 45 percent of the country's population, but receives only 25 percent of the public works money. This works out to about $6 per person spent in our region, compared to about $20 spent on the rest of the country. Locks, dams, flood control projects, sewers, and water systems are in a declining state in many of these older communities. The bill before us today attempts to redress these imbalances in several ways.

Second, under this bill, Congress would authorize the Corps of Engineers for the first time to establish a loan program to repair and rehabilitate municipal water supply systems. The Northeast-Midwest States can expect to receive 91 percent of these funds. Without this bill, the corps is limited to "multipurpose" projects, which, to be funded, must provide multiple benefits like recreation and navigation. By establishing a single purpose program, we will be able to repair aging water systems—a real breakthrough for areas like mine.

Third, the bill includes the suggestion of Pittsburgh area Members of Congress to include in their amendment Federal assistance for the Turtle Creek flood control project. This is a project in a great state of disrepair that cannot now handle threatened flooding. If we do not move on it, 340,000 people in 30 municipalities could be affected, including people in Penn Hills, Braddock Hills, and Forest Hills. The boroughs involved have and will continue to contribute to the project, but only Federal assistance can expedite the project and avoid human and property damage that could be devastating. I hope the House will agree to the amendment that add Turtle Creek to the bill.

Fourth, this bill will aid the economy of areas still suffering from recession. In Pittsburgh, waterways are a fundamental underpinning of the economy. Our three rivers provide transportation for coal, chemicals, and steel. In gross tonnage, Pittsburgh is the largest inland port in the United States, moving 41 million tons of freight annually.

But our locks and dams were built in another time for another time. They are old, falling apart, and woefully inadequate. By 1990, we will see 78-hour delays in traffic on the Ohio. This would mean $400 extra cost per hour per tow. Our industries and the Pittsburgh economy can just not afford these extra costs if we are to remain competitive. Added transportation costs means higher consumer costs. One of the major factors in the price of coal—and thus electricity—is transportation. An efficient navigable waterway system is essential to keep costs down. The same is true for coal-dependent products like steel, which is so important to our economy.

In the Pittsburgh area, the rivers are an economic lifeline. 85,000 jobs directly depend on the availability and use of river transportation. I am pleased that the House of Representatives is today taking this step toward bringing some national fairness and economic revitalization to our area and am pleased to cast my vote for this bill.●

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, in his report of April 26, 1983, the Chief of Engineers recommended authorization of the Gregory County hydroelectric pumped storage facility. To be constructed adjacent to Lake Francis Case, it would be implemented in two stages, each stage with a capacity of 1,180 megawatts. According to the report of the Chief of Engineers, the cost of the Gregory County project, based on October 1981 price levels, would be $1,502,834,000 and the project would have a cost-benefit ratio of 1.6.

In a report issued earlier by the Omaha district engineer, it was noted there is a need for 10,000 to 11,000 megawatts of additional generating capacity in the 1990's to meet future power supply needs in the region. As further noted in this report, the Gregory County hydroelectric pumped storage facility with a potential capacity of nearly 2,400 megawatts would make a tremendous contribution to the energy supply needs of the region. After much evaluation, the Corps of Engineers has determined that the facility is not only economically feasible, but would provide greater savings than conventional hydropower in meeting the power needs of the region, and is the most significant opportunity for additional hydropower on the Missouri River main stem system.

Legislation reported by the Committee on Environment and Public Works in the Senate already authorizes construction of the Gregory County hydroelectric pumped storage project by the Corps of Engineers. Based on the projected power needs of the region, the contribution which can be made by the Gregory County project to meeting these future power needs, and the economic feasibility of this project, I urge the chairman and those who will sit on the conference in the House to recognize the benefits of authorizing construction of the Gregory County pumped storage hydroelectric facility and support the project when it is considered in the conference.●

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw my colleagues' attention to two provisions in the committee amendment to H.R. 3678 which are of tremendous importance to my district.

First, section 114 authorizes the construction of a new harbor office in Morro Bay, CA. Morro Bay is the only harbor of refuge on California's central coast, but it also has an unofficial reputation as one of the most dangerous harbor entrances on the west coast. At least 15 lives have been lost at the harbor entrance in the last 20 years due to high surf and treacherous currents.

Such dangerous conditions make it essential for the harbor's users to have immediate access to emergency rescue services. However, the harbor's safety problem is compounded by the fact that its patrol officers do not, from the present harbor office, have a clear view of the harbor. From the existing office, the harbor patrol has only a 2- to 3-minute timespan in which vessels approaching the harbor entrance can be seen, and the view of the entrance itself is completely blocked. For this reason, the city of Morro Bay has given its approval to construction of a new harbor office in a location which would provide an unobstructed view of the harbor, and would also cut down on the time required for the harbor patrol to reach the scene of an accident.

In view of the harbor's importance to all those who travel the central California coast, I do not think it is realistic or fair to expect the local community to bear the costs of constructing the new office. Unfortunately, funding is not available from other Federal or State sources for this purpose, and accordingly the committee has included authorization for this project in the bill pending before us. The estimated cost of the new office is $250,000, and I would hope the House will approve this urgently needed project.

Second, section 712 of H.R. 3678, as included in the committee amendment, makes some important modifications in the authorization for Santa Cruz Harbor. Santa Cruz is a multipurpose harbor which is vital to the livelihoods of many individuals in my district. The harbor, unfortunately, has experienced massive shoaling ever since its construction, and even with annual dredging, the harbor is forced to close for 3 to 4 months every year at considerable cost to the local economy. At the same time, as my colleagues are well aware, operation and maintenance funds for small harbors are increasingly difficult to come by due to the constraints of the Federal budget.

Santa Cruz Port District officials have reached an agreement with the Corps of Engineers which will allow for procurement of a dredging system to be owned and operated by the harbor itself. The corps has agreed to reimburse the local interests for 80 percent of the cost of this system, and in turn, the Federal Government will be relieved of any financial obligation in terms of future operation and maintenance of the harbor. The corps has also agreed to undertake a comprehensive study of long-term solutions to the harbor's shoaling problem. The language included in the committee amendment as section 712 reflects these recently concluded negotiations. I am hopeful that this agreement will help bring about a lasting and effective solution to the harbor's problems, without the continuing drain on the Federal budget which the need for annual maintenance dredging entails.

I very much appreciate the assistance of Chairman ROE and Chairman HOWARD in including these important provisions in the committee amendment, and I urge my colleagues' support.●

● Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, the water resources authorization bill contains many provisions that are important to our Nation and one that is particularly important to the people of western Illinois.

This provision clarifies the Army Corps of Engineers' policy in regard to terminating campsite leases along the Mississippi River. Since coming to Congress some 18 months ago, I have had the opportunity to meet with and work with a group of concerned citizens who have joined together to form the Two Rivers Campsite Preservation Coalition. These are not wealthy nor powerful people, but rather individuals who have been energized by a common concern for fair treatment. They have worked with Members of Congress along both sides of the Mississippi River in seeking their goal, and their campaign has been marked by reason and commonsense.

At issue here and addressed by this bill is a policy of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers that calls for the termination of campsite leases along the Mississippi River. More than 2,000 families now hold campsite leases along the river. These are people who gained these leases back in the 1950's when the corps was encouraging this mild form of development on the public land that adjoins the river.

Those who hold these campsite leases are individuals who love the outdoors. There are no expensive homes on these sites nor commercial ventures. These are simple vacation and weekend retreats for those who enjoy time spent along this beautiful river.

Leaseholders, by their presence, have also provided a degree of security and aid for those who use the river.

The provision in this bill that affects the leaseholders simply states that the Corps of Engineers cannot terminate these leases unless a higher priority use is shown for the land, such as a park development or use in a flood control or navigation project. This will provide the current leaseholders with assurance that they will not be tossed off the land.

When the Government sought people to use the riverfront to provide a small degree of development, these individuals responded. I do not think this measure of clarification is too much for them to seek in return.●

● Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate JIM HOWARD, chairman of our Public Works and Transportation Committee, and ROBERT ROE, chairman of the Water Resources Subcommittee, for their tireless effort in bringing to this floor a bill which truly furthers our progress toward the Clean Water Act's goal of fishable, swimmable waters, This is a goal to which I am utterly committed, as are Chairmen HOWARD and ROE, and, I am convinced, the vast majority of the American people on both ends of the political spectrum.

In addition to increasing EPA's straight authorization for the municipal wastewater construction grants program, this bill authorizes $1.6 billion annually through fiscal 1988 for grants to the States for water pollution control revolving funds. These moneys are desperately needed by municipalities to construct the sewage treatment facilities upon which the Clean Water Act depends. Back in 1981, the Reagan administration announced it would not seek funding for treatment of plant construction unless the program was significantly scaled back. Congress amended the Clean Water Act that year by cutting in half funding to help cities build treatment facilities, and by reducing the Federal share of construction costs from 75 percent to 55 percent. H.R. 3282 sets the Federal share at 65 percent. Under the bill, States must deposit an amount equal to 20 percent of the Federal money before receiving a grant, and they may use the funds only to make loans, loan guarantees, payments to reduce interest on loans, bond interest subsidies and bond guarantees to municipalities and interstate agencies. I think this is a responsible way to proceed and I believe it will help municipalities meet the objectives in the act in a more timely fashion.

Another critical element of this bill, an element which will bring us closer to our goal of pollution-free waters, is a brand new program to address the reality of nonpoint source pollution, or runoff. The committee hearings established that in many areas, runoff from paved streets, fields, mine, and construction sites result in the flow of large amounts of toxic metals, organic pollutants, fertilizers, and pesticides into our Nation's waters. Nonpoint source pollution, in fact, is the major source of pollution in many areas.

The bill also requires EPA in cooperation with the States to begin planning how to attain water quality standards in "hot spots," or extremely polluted waters which even the Clean Water Act's requirements cannot adequately address.

Mr. Chairman, there was some question, when this bill came out of committee, whether it would arrive at the House floor with the vital support of the environmental community. I am gratified the environmental and industry leaders, as well as Chairmen HOWARD and ROE, were able to arrive, after many hours of hard work, at a compromise supportable by all concerned. The Clean Water Act has been one of the great success stories of the Federal Government in the area of pollution control. Many rivers and lakes have been restored and fish are returning to what once were considered ruined waters. I know this is true of my area in particular. The San Jacinto River and the Houston ship channel empty into Galveston Bay which is one of the largest food producing and recreational bays in the country. Thus, the quality of the water flowing into Galveston Bay is of vital importance to not only the health of those living in my State but critical to our economic viability. Significant improvements have been made in the water quality of the Houston ship channel due to the efforts both of industry on the channel and area municipalities. In fact, for the most part, the industry along the channel is not even emptying as much waste as their licenses allow, and that's a pretty good sign, a sign that points straight to the Clean Water Act.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 3282 will ensure that the Clean Water Act keeps us on the path to our goal of fishable, swimmable waters. I wholeheartedly support it.●

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the water resource authorization (H.R. 3678). I would like to commend the gentlemen from New Jersey [Mr. HOWARD and Mr. ROE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI] and the members of their respective subcommittees for the fine work they have done in bringing this legislation before the House today.

I know how very difficult it is to craft a bill of this nature. As a member of the Energy and Water Development Appropriations Subcommittee these projects, I know all too well how they must compete for support and funding.

Deep-draft port development and the revitalization and modernization of our great inland waterway network are two areas that we must address. For the past 10 years the Federal Government has, in effect, withdrawn its active support from port and inland waterways development. That 10-year hiatus is not at an end.

Over the past 10 years the demand for increased efficiencies in water borne transportation to maintain our export capacity has increased tremendously. Our ports are doing all they can to improve competition in the international marketplace. They are improving their efficiency by investing in modern shoreside facilities. Since World War II, non-Federal U.S. port entities have invested more than $45 billion in new and improved cargo-handling facilities including wharves, docks, transit shed, storage areas and warehouses, container yards, and cranes and other equipment. To meet the future needs of U.S. commerce, the port industry will be investing a billion dollars a year or more through the remainder of the decade to expand and improve terminal handling facilities.

Our foreign trade is as vital to our economy as it has ever been. In the past 20 years, foreign trade, as a proportion of our GNP, has increased substantially from 5.4 percent in 1960 to 10 percent in 1970, and to approximately 25 percent in 1981. Most of this trade moves by ship to and from our ports.

In addition to its influence on our economy generally, our foreign trade has a profound impact on Federal revenues. In 1981 alone the cargo moving in U.S. foreign commerce generated approximately $6 billion in U.S. customs revenues. During that same year, it should be noted, Federal expenditures on deep draft navigation projects amounted to approximately $350 million. The Government is getting a very handsome return on its investment, measured in customs revenues alone.

One of our principal trading ports is the Port of New Orleans. Although the Mississippi River is 100 feet deep at New Orleans, the depth of the river at some points between the Gulf of Mexico and Baton Rouge does not presently allow the large, modern cargo vessels to be fully loaded. Consequently, it is inefficient and more expensive for the deeper draft ships to use the Port of New Orleans and the other Louisiana ports.

This inefficiency has an effect on commerce, industry and agriculture throughout the country. In 1981 Louisiana's deep-draft ports transshipped 190.7 short tons worth $44.1 billion. Translating that impact into jobs throughout the mid-America States means that approximately 207,000 jobs were related to foreign, oceangoing trade.

Foreign trade means jobs and the Louisiana ports handle approximately 21.5 percent of the Nation's foreign waterborne trade. If we improve efficiency at these ports by deepening the accessible draft, then we will increase the efficiency of our commerce.

The deepening of the Mississippi River has received the enthusiastic support of the shipping industry, the ports and the upriver States whose bulk commodities would move in bigger ships. A deeper river channel will lower the cost of needed imports, improve the competitiveness of our export on the world market, improve our country's balance of trade position and help our farmers, coal miners and shippers.

I am pleased that the committee has seen fit to include the deepening of the Mississippi River in this legislation.

In addition, I am grateful that the committee has seen fit to include a fast-track mechanism and a financing for the non-Federal share mechanism/ in the bill. Both of these provision, which I requested the committee to include, are essential to the successful completion of the deep-draft project.

Finally, I Think it wise that this legislation does not impose any additional user changes. There is a significant body of evidence that indicates the cumulative impact of additional user charges on waterborne commerce.

Mr. Chairman, it is time we recognize the local and national importance of our river and port system. The deepening of the Mississippi River will have a very positive impact on our national economy by enabling the more efficient export of coal, grains and other commodities from the heartland of America.

I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. BOGGS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 3678, the Water Resources Development Act, and I would like to call the attention of the House to two provisions of the bill which are of particular interest and importance to me and the people that I represent in Ohio's 13th District.

For the last 6 years, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has been conducting a feasibility study for improvements to the Lorain Harbor, Lorain, OH. This study has now been completed. We are now ready for the next phase of the project, ready to enter the construction stage, which will implement the recommendations of the Corps of Engineers.

H.R. 3678 contains the authorization fo $32,000,000 to move forward with the implementation of the recommended improvements to the Lorain Harbor. These improvements include widening three upriver bend cuts in the Black River Channel—a modification that will allow the larger ore vessels which are becoming more and more common on the Great Lakes to move up the channel safely. This modification will permit efficient navigation by vessels larger than seaway class which carry ore and stone to industries upriver, including a United States Steel plant.

This project is of extreme importance to the economy of Lorain County, a point I cannot stress enough. Just last year, the American Shipbuilding Co. shut down its Lorain yard, eliminating 1,500 jobs. The company's reasons for closing the plant were many and varied, but among them was the fact that the Lorain Harbor is difficult to use. The harbor modifications recommended by the corps will go a long way toward easing some of the problems that convinced Amship officials that the Lorain plant was no longer a profitable site. Lorain officials are now trying to find another ship builder to take over the Amship site. The construction phase of the Lorain Harbor improvements would be a great asset to their important task.

The United States Steel plant in Lorain is rebounding, and that company views its Lorain location as a prime site for future expansion. As Lorain County struggles to recover its economic base following the devastation of the most recent recession, I once again must must stress the vital importance of upgrading the Lorain Harbor as a means of strengthening our local industries and easing the unemployment that has plagued us for so long.

I would like to commend Congressmen HOWARD and ROE in particular and all of the members of the Public Works Committee for including in section 1108 of this bill the language needed to ensure that the Army Corps of Engineers has the statutory language to contribute up to $1 million for nonstructural as well as structural remedies of problems at least partially caused by corps water resources projects.

It is appropriate that the corps, as the agent of the Federal Government, have the statutory authority to own up to its responsibility and to correct is mistakes. The need for amending the existing language of the River and Harbors Act of 1968 in this manner has been brought home to me by a worsening shore erosion problem in Lorain, OH, that I have been struggling to redress for more than 4 years.

By way of background, the corps built a dike disposal area a few years ago in Lorain Harbor to receive silt from nearby dredging operations. Subsequently, the corps found that construction of the dike disposal had contributed to worsening shore erosion that is threatening the homes of at least fifteen families. A park acquisition plan has been developed whereby local, State and corps funds could be pooled to buy the endangered homes and property for conversion into a public park, But the language in this bill is needed to authorize the corps to contribute to nonstructural remedies like a park acquisition plan.

If this bill is signed into law, the corps ought to then focus its attention upon finalizing its contribution toward possible implementation—if local approval is given—of the park acquisition plan along Lakeside Avenue in Lorain.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. BOGGS. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the distinguished chairman of the Water Resources Subcommittee, Mr. ROE, and all the members of the committee for giving their consideration to the needs of the Cleveland Harbor and providing $36 million in this bill to improve our harbor. The widening and deepening of the east and west entrances of the harbor will permit larger vessels to enter the harbor and facilitate safe navigation during all weather conditions. This is particularly important because of the volatility of Lake Erie weather. Once the improvements are complete, Lake Erie vessels will be able to find shelter in Cleveland Harbor should sudden storms develop, as they often do in the Great Lakes.

Cleveland is one of the older cities on the Great Lakes and there has been a long-standing need to repair and improve our harbor facilities. The funds authorized in this bill will permit the latest generation of lake vessels to navigate our harbor. There is also a pressing need to replace bulkheads in the Cuyahoga River portion of our harbor and at pier 34 along the lake. It is hoped that the cost-efficient work on the east and west entrances will also permit consideration for other repairs.

I have to note with some regret that during consideration of the Cleveland Harbor project, the Army Corps of Engineers was not as cooperative as they might have been. At times, important information was not communicated properly. On other occasions, misleading information was given. This made proper consideration of the project difficult. In addition, the Army Corps of Engineers gave misleading information in their attempt to lobby my community leaders against this project. I am frankly astounded by their boldness and untruths.

Those familiar with the city of Cleveland know of the city's historic dynamism and its enormous potential for the years ahead. The city has recently endured some difficult times, bearing the brunt of recession as well as structural change in the local and regional economy. The authorization of improvements to Cleveland's Harbor will help the city and the general area. To achieve maximum benefits from the funds authorized in this legislation, the cooperation of all will be required. I hope that the Army Corps of Engineers will undertake the assigned project with a spirit of cooperation and sense of involvement with what Clevelanders want to do for our city and our region. I pledge my own cooperation with the Army Corps of Engineers and invite their positive involvement with this important project.

Again, I thank the chairman and the committee for its recognition of Cleveland's needs and our efforts to more forward. This authorization will certainly contribute to the continuing efforts of Cleveland to improve our city and its economic environment.

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer en bloc nine amendments that have been reviewed by both our side of the aisle and by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota, and I would like to offer them on behalf of the following Members: Two in the name of Mr. ENGLISH; one in the name of Mr. GUNDERSON; one in the name Mr. PARRIS; one in the name of Mr. MATSUI; one in the name of Mr. DYSON; one in the name of Mr. WYDEN; one in the name of Mr. PATMAN; and one in the name of Mr. DONNELLY.

I would like to offer those in my own name, on their behalf.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. FRENZEL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, have the amendments been reviewed by the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. ROE. If the gentleman will yield, I have not personally discussed them with the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the legislation and to thank the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE] for the courtesies extended to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want to join my colleagues in saluting the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE] for his tireless efforts on this bill as chairman of the Subcommittee on Water Resources. I know of those efforts from personal experience, since the gentleman graciously agreed to visit my congressional district in order to better understand my concerns over section 1123 of the bill as originally proposed, which deals with the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway system.

I want to thank the gentleman for the interest which he demonstrated and for his assistance in reaching an acceptable revision of section 1123, from which all references to changes in the system's navigation season have been deleted.

The bill before us clearly addresses the need to improve the capacity and capability of the system and the region it serves without extending the system's navigation season.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. ROE

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, I offer amendments en bloc, pursuant to my unanimous-consent request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 298, strike out line 1 and all that follows through line 10 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 1169. (a) Section 201 of the Flood Control Act of 1970, as amended by section 153 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1976, is amended by striking out the last sentence under the center heading "Arkansas-Red River Basin" and adding the following: "The chloride control projects for the Red River Basin and the Arkansas River Basin shall be considered to be authorized as separate projects, with separate authority under section 203 of the Flood Control Act of 1966, as amended.".

(b) The first sentence of the paragraph under the center heading "ARKANSAS AND RED RIVERS" in section 203 of the Flood Control Act of 1966, as amended, is amended by striking out "$46,400,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$177,600,000. These funds shall be expended solely for the Red River portion of the project.".

(c) The Secretary is authorized and directed to restudy that portion of the project for water quality control in the Arkansas-Red River Basin, Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas, which portion is located within the Arkansas River Basin, to reevaluate such portion in light of policies established under this Act and to recommend any modifications which the Secretary determines to be necessary and appropriate to optimize the benefits associated with such portion. Not later than three years after the date of enactment of his Act, the Secretary shall submit the results of his study and his recommendations to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate."

"SEC. 620. The Secretary is authorized and directed to complete a study of the Army Corps of Engineers' project evaluation and selection criteria identifying all factors which create a disproportionate burden adverse to the selection of flood control or other projects under the Secretary's authority in rural areas and in areas with greater percentages of low-income individuals. Within one year of the enactment of this Act the Secretary shall transmit a report to Congress on the results of such study together with specific recommendations for changes in the selection criteria that would effectively eliminate any bias against projects in such areas."

SEC. 620. The Secretary is authorized and directed to study the eradication and control of hydrilla in the Potomac River and to develop an effective plan of action for such eradication and control. Not later than May 31, 1985, the Secretary shall submit to Congress a report on the results of such study together with the plan of action which the Secretary recommends and an estimate of the cost of implementing such plan.

SEC. 1174. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the State of California or any political subdivision thereof, or any non-Federal public body organized under the laws of the State of California, which is operating the William G. Stone Lock in Yolo County, California, under lease agreement with the Secretary may levy and collect tolls or other user fees from vessels using such lock. Such tolls or fees shall be in amounts not exceeding amounts necessary to recover the costs of operating and maintaining the William G. Stone Lock by such State, political subdivision, or public body under such lease agreement.

(b) Any lease for the operation of the William G. Stone lock entered into by the Secretary after the date of enactment of this Act shall require the lessee to develop a plan of operation for such lock acceptable to Yolo County, California.

SEC. 762. The project for navigation, Cambridge Creek, Maryland, is modified to authorize and direct the Secretary to narrow the channel in the existing project, as determined necessary by the Secretary for the purpose of enhancing economic development in the area of such creek. No appropriation shall be made for carrying out such modification, if such modification has not been approved by resolution adopted by the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate.

SEC. 1403. Section 5 of the Act of August 18, 1894 (33 U.S.C. 499), shall not apply to the drawbridge known as the James A. Burke Bridge crossing the Fore River on Route 3A between Quincy and Weymouth, Massachusetts. The State of Massachusetts shall have the exclusive authority to regulate the opening of such bridge.

Mr. ROE (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment to the Water Resources Conservation Act of 1985 because a crisis exists right here in our own front yard.

The Potomac River, which is one of this Nation's recreational treasures, is about to be lost forever unless Congress takes firm, swift action.

There is an insidious weed, called hydrilla, which is spreading so fast that our experts tell us if we do not begin controlling it this year, and then continue battling it in years to come, it will multiply and spread its green, odorous, noxious mats on each side of the river until it meets in the center.

This may sound like a low-budget science fiction movie, but I assure you that hydrilla is, indeed, a green monster that can and will eat the Potomac if we do not act.

If you haven't seen this green weed, let me give you a frame of reference. It is an aquatic version of kudzu, the vine that was planted some years ago along our interstates because it helped impede erosion and now covers thousands of acres throughout most of the South and Southeast.

Hydrilla is out of control in Florida, where it has choked whole lakes and streams, and I am told, has actually caused the deaths of swimmers who have been entangled in it.

I have asked the Secretary of the Army to redirect some contingency funds and research funds to finance a pilot program of control during this summer's growing season. A preliminary plan has already been developed by the Army Corps of Engineers.

But this is not the complete answer.

That is why this amendment would instruct the Army Corps of Engineers to continue its studies, in concert with the Department of Agriculture and other cooperating Federal agencies, and devise a containment plan and estimate its cost by May 1985, just before the start of the next growing season.

It would not cost any money, except for the study itself.

I respectfully urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Chairman, as I have explained to the Members, those are a series of technical adjustments of other Members, and again we have no objection on our side to the amendments.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to urge my colleagues to approve the amendment we have introduced to title VI of this important bill. The purpose of my amendment is to require the Secretary to study the exsisting Army Corps of Engineers selection and evaluation criteria and procedures to identify those elements that place a disproportionate burden on flood control or other projects under the Secretary's authority in these areas.

Further, the Secretary is required to recommend changes necessary to eliminate that bias through the submission of a report to the Congress within 1 year following enactment of this law.

I have become convinced the existing procedures are biased against these areas and believe we must begin the process of identifying remedies to this bias.

A number of points can be made here to highlight my assertion of bias. For example, an area of higher property values and populated by families with higher incomes is far more likely to be selected for a flood control project than a poor area. However, individuals with higher incomes have far more options available to them to take individual action to protect themselves from hazard or to relocate their dwellings or positions to reduce damages due to floods. These options are not available in the same fashion to those with lower incomes. Yet the process is less likely to chose an area with lower property values due to lower values for flooding damage. This factor should be reflected in the evaluation and selection considerations.

In addition, corps procedures fail to adequately reflect the value of damage to agricultural production capacity resulting from flood. While crops lost are considered, the permanent loss to the productivity of the land itself lost through flooding is not reflected. We should alter our practices to ensure we protect the land itself not just the momentary loss of its current yield.

Rural, underdeveloped areas can also benefit directly from the spark of economic growth resulting from increased flood protection. Existing owners benefit from increased property sale values and the entire community benefits from improved development opportunities resulting from reduced flooding risks. These benefits are not properly factored into corps decision.

In conclusion, the Congress can and should act not through the adoption of this amendment to identify all biases against rural and low-income areas present in the present procedures for evaluating and selecting projects. H.R. 3678 is a monument in testimony to the hard and effective work of the members of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation. This legislation is needed. This amendment is needed. I urge you to adopt the amendment and to go on to pass this legislation.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment to correct an urgent and frustrating problem that has plagued motorists from the south shore area of Massachusetts for years. The problem involves the drawbridge located in my district that has been repeatedly opened during normal commuting hours. Opening the drawbridge during rush hour stops all traffic dead in its tracks. However, unlike a traffic jam, there is no hope of automobiles creeping along at a slow pace. The resulting delays are understandbly infuriating as motorists sit helplessly for up to half an hour while the ship passes through. There is absolutely no reason for the bulk of these unnecessary delays.

Although the magnitude of such unpredictable delays is obvious, negotiations with the Coast Guard have not produced an adequate solution. Current Federal regulations afford all water traffic the right-of-way over land traffic. These regulations made sense in the early 1900's when they were enacted, but they are no longer applicable to the demands of modern transportation. While ship passings have decreased, traffic congestion has become a major problem in the Boston area.

Random opening of the drawbridge is intolerable. There may be 1 or 2 days a month when tide conditions make it important for a ship to pass during commuter hours, however, there are many more days when rush hour passage is nothing more than a matter of convenience for the ship operators. The present 2-year reconstruction effort on the Southeast Expressway has aggravated the problem further by increasing the traffic pressure on Route 3A.

The problem was brought to its most absurd extreme earlier this spring when the bridge was raised in the middle of a 10-kilometer road race taking place on Route 3A. Rather than jump the widening gap, half of the contenders in the race prudently waited for the bridge to close. Clearly, this demonstrates the need to reconcile current regulations governing the drawbridge with the needs of the surrounding communities.

My amendment would turn the authority to regulate the bridge over to the State of Massachusetts. By granting this authority to the State, proper weight can be given to all factors involved in this unfortunate situation and a quick, effective solution can be reached.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Chairman, I am offering an amendment that has been developed by the Oklahoma delegation as a compromise.

The amendment separates the Arkansas River and the Red River basin chloride control projects, both located in Oklahoma, and requires that each project stand on its own merits. Unfortunately, current law permits funding authorized and intended for the Red River project to be spent on the Arkansas project. This could happen despite the fact that the Corps of Engineers has concluded after extensive study that the Arkansas River project is not economically feasible and that the corps should not proceed with it.

A closer look at the Arkansas project will reveal the actual scope of this billion dollar question mark. Basically, the Arkansas project contains a series of projects consisting of shallow saltbrine ponds which would be used to collect, store, divert, and dispose of salt brine. These ponds would require the sacrifice of at least 60,000 acres of land in western Oklahoma.

Congress authorized the Arkansas project in the Flood Control Act of 1970. At the same time, and using the same provision, Congress authorized construction on sites for the Red River project; 3 years later, Congress appropriated funds for postauthorization studies of the Arkansas, and the corps began these studies in 1974.

In 1977, corps officials testified on the Arkansas project. At that time, the corps stated that unless Congress was prepared to make a total commitment to the complete Arkansas project, then Congress should not support any part of it. Furthermore, at that time, the corps was not prepared to give its go-ahead for the entire project. In 1978, the Secretary of the Corps of Engineers indicated that more detailed economic studies should be conducted. In 1981, over 10 years after the initial authorization of the Arkansas project, the corps issued its report on the merits of proceeding with the Arkansas project.

The corps rejected plans to proceed with the Arkansas project.

Specifically, the corps found that for every $1 spent on the project, only 25 cents would be returned in benefits. Since this ratio was substantially lower than the required dollar-for-dollar cost-to-benefit ratio, the corps found that the project was not economically feasible. Furthermore, the corps recommended tabling the project until a significant change occurred which "clearly demonstrates a greater need and probable use of the improved water." This has yet to happen, and I seriously doubt that it ever will.

To underscore the corps' opposition, the corps concluded that the economic analysis showed the current projections of water use and resulting water quality benefits from the selected plan did not equal the costs of construction. Additionally, the corps stated that the "environmental analysis showed that there would be no outstanding contributions to the environmental quality account to offset the lack of economic benefits."

Taxpayers from throughout Oklahoma have expressed their concern over and opposition to the Arkansas project. Frankly, I believe the Arkansas project should be deauthorized. in fact, I think any project which has been around for as long as this one has with a benefit-cost ratio of 25 cents on the dollar should be deauthorized. However, some people, downstream from where over 60,000 acres would be covered with 2 feet of salt water, disagree.

In the spirit of compromise, the Oklahoma delegation has agreed that the Arkansas and Red River projects at least should be separated. While these two projects now share authorization language and are both chloride control projects, they have nothing else in common. The Red River project should not be allowed to give benefits to the Arkansas project. Money intended for construction of the Red River project should not be spent on the Arkansas. Each project should stand on its own merits.

This compromise is both good policy and good business for taxpayers and I urge the Members to support it.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have a short, noncontroversial amendment that I would like to offer at this time.

This amendment is to the Bonneville lock authorization, which is in title II of the bill. This amendment simply deletes the reference to "Ross Island" in the language that refers to deposition of the dredged material from the lock and replaces it with "such sites considered by the Secretary to be appropriate."

The minor change is needed to make sure that no entity has the appearance of being favored in the decision of where the dredged material should be deposited. My amendment does not eliminate Ross Island from being considered as a location to deposit the spoils, but only ensures that no one site will be favored over any other.

I have talked to my colleague ROBERT SMITH of Oregon, a member of the committee, and he agrees with this amendment.

I appreciate the chairman's understanding of our concern over the existing language and ask my colleague's support of the simple and noncontroversial amendment.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3678 and the amendment being offered by the chairman of the Water Resources Subcommittee, Mr. ROE.

Among the projects included in this legislation is the St. Johns Bayou and New Madrid floodway flood control project. Many of my constituents have been working literally for decades to see this project authorized. In fact, when the subcommittee held hearings on this project one witness produced a copy a letter written by then-Senator Harry S. Truman in support of the St. Johns-New Madrid project. So, as you can see, this is not a new issue, but one that has been around for several years and one that is necessary to protect thousands of acres of farmland, the urban areas of three major towns, and Interstate Highway 55 from the floodwaters of the Mississippi River.

Also included in H.R. 3678 is the Cape Girardeau-Jackson metropolitan area, MO, project. Although downtown Cape Girardeau, MO, was protected during the 1973 Mississippi River flood, $3 million in damages occurred that could have been prevented by this project. A flash flood in 1977 caused about $5 million in damages throughout the area that will be protected by this project. The Cape La Croix Creek watershed area is experiencing a significant population growth and urbanization and this project is badly needed to reduce flood damages and to properly manage the urbanization floodplains.

Finally, the Ste. Genevieve, MO, flood control project is included in the amendment being offered by Mr. ROE. Not including the Spanish Missions in the west, Ste. Genevieve, MO, is the oldest European settlement west of the Mississippi River. It was founded in the Louisiana Territory and is a national historic landmark. According to the U.S. Department of the Interior,

It is obvious that the nationally significant historic values of Ste. Genevieve should be protected.

This project is also supported by the Center for French Colonial Studies, the Missouri Heritage Trust, the Landmarks Association of St. Louis, the National Trust for Historic Preservation, the National Society of Colonial Dames, and the Republic of France. Without this project, the historic 18th century architecture in Ste. Genevieve could be lost during any flood season and I believe the benefits of this project far outweigh the small monetary cost it will require.

In closing, I want to thank all the members of the Public Works and Transportation Committee for their tireless efforts on this legislation. I would like to particularly mention the chairman of the committee, Mr. HOWARD, the ranking Republican, Mr. SNYDER, the chairman of the Water Resources Subcommittee, Mr. ROE, and the ranking Republican on the subcommittee, Mr. STANGELAND. Also, I would like to extend my gratitude to my colleague from Missouri, Mr. YOUNG, who has spent an enormous amount of time and energy on this legislation.

I urge the adoption of the Roe amendment and the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with this particular amendment, but particularly that part which is known as the Gunderson portion of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONABLE. I do not mean to sound unpleasant, but how much does this cost?

Mr. ROE. We do not have it.

Mr. CONABLE. You do not have any idea?

Mr. ROE. As far as we know, there is no additional cost. Most of these amendments are technical in nature and they are deauthorizations and studies.

Mr. CONABLE. I appreciate the explanation. I think it is important at a time like this. We frequently make very serious mistakes at times like this.

Mr. ROE. We are trying not to, believe me.

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Chairman, Mr. FAZIO and I offer this amendment to allow local authorities to collect user fees to pay for the cost of operating the Stone Lock in Sacramento. This is a facility which was to have been closed by the Corps of Engineers because it no longer carries commercial traffic.

I ask unanimous consent to have the remainder of my statement included in the RECORD.

When the Sacramento Deep Water Ship Channel was first constructed, with the Port of Sacramento at its upstream end, the William G. Stone lock was also built to accommodate barge traffic between the port and the Sacramento River. Such barge traffic diminished over the years; it has been a very long time since the lock was used for other than passage of recreational boats.

Because it was no longer a portion of our national system of waterborne commercial traffic, the Corps of Engineers appropriately determined that continued operation at Federal expense was no longer justified. It was properly scheduled to be closed. Continued maintenance of the lock by the corps does make sense as an economical means to carry out other corps responsibilities, such as maintenance of water quality in the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta.

Various public agencies in the Sacramento area expressed interest in the continued operation of the lock to accommodate recreational boats and tour boats visiting the historic area of old Sacramento. The lock is currently being leased from the corps by the Sacramento Housing and Redevelopment Agency—a joint city-county entity—and is being operated by an employee of the city of Sacramento. The cost is being borne by the city, which would like to be able to be reimbursed by the actual users of the lock. We believe that such operation of the lock is worthwhile, but agree that it can in no way be considered a Federal responsibility. The opinion of the Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works is that no local entity can legally levy fees to recover the costs of operating the lock.

This amendment would simply waive the obstacles in U.S. statutes to having a local government collect such fees in this specific case. I would add that the circumstances of the status of this particular facility are so extraordinary that no one should look to this amendment for a precedent for how to handle the costs of operating and improving our national system of waterborne commerce. To do so would be to have a microscopic tail wagging many large dogs. The cost of this operation of Stone Lock is well under $100,000 per year.

Finally Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer special thanks to the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. ROE] and to Bob Dawson, the Acting ASA for Civil Works, for their patience and support over the last 2 years in finding a way to satisfy both the plans of our local community and our responsibility to the Federal taxpayer.●

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to join my colleague BOB MATSUI today in the introduction of this amendment to allow for local financing of the operations of the William G. Stone Lock in Yolo County, CA. I think this amendment gives local governments an option for the future of the lock they may well wish to exercise for the betterment of northern California. At the same time it provides assurances to Yolo County that its needs will be taken into account in the operation of the lock.

The lock is a valuable facility caught in highly unusual circumstances. All of us concerned deeply appreciate the special consideration shown our situation by Mr. ROE and Mr. HOWARD despite the many hundreds of other concerns weighing on them as they move this vital piece of legislation forward.●

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. ROE).

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there other amendments? If not, the question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. FOLEY] having assumed the chair, Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR., Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 3678) to provide for the conservation and development of water and related resources and the improvement and rehabilitation of the Nation's water resources infrastructure, pursuant to House Resolution 515, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MRS. JOHNSON

Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentlewoman opposed to the bill?

Mrs. JOHNSON. I am, Mr. Speaker, in its present form.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mrs. JOHNSON moves to recommit the bill, H.R. 3678, the Water Resources Conservation, Development, and Infrastructure Improvement and Rehabilitation Act of 1983, to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

AUTHORIZING USE OF WEST FRONT STEPS OF U.S. CAPITOL TO HONOR THE MEN AND WOMEN OF THE U.S. OLYMPIC TEAMS

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 127) to authorize the use of the west front steps of the U.S. Capitol Building on August 14, 1984, to honor the men and women of the U.S. Olympic teams, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 127

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That on August 14, 1984, the west front steps of the United States Capitol Building may be used for the purpose of Members of Congress giving tribute to the men and women of the United States Olympic Teams and for the conduct of ceremonies in connection with such use.

SEC. 2. Physical preparations for the conduct of the ceremonies authorized by the first section shall be carried out by the Architect of the Capitol in accordance with such conditions as he may prescribe.

The Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JEAN WILLHELM WILLRICH

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 2729) for the relief of Jean Willhelm Willrich, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the relief of Jean Willhelm Willrich must be considered expeditiously or become a moot issue. Briefly, the petitioner for relief, Jean Willrich, must be a U.S. citizen by July 1, 1984, to participate as a member of the U.S. Olympic soccer team. Mr. Willrich, a standout performer with the San Diego Sockers, is eligible for naturalization August 12, 1984, thus the effect of this legislation is to adjust his eligibility date 6 weeks.

Mr. Willrich came to the United States in 1978 when he was purchased by the San Diego Sockers from PSV Eindhoven of Holland's First Division, one of the world's foremost ranking club teams. His exploits on the soccer field are such that he was voted "Most Valuable Player" during the Sockers' third, and most recent, indoor soccer championship.

The coach of the U.S. Olympic soccer team, Alkis Panagoulias, formally signified his interest in Mr. Willrich by letter to the Sockers on May 9, 1984.

Unfortunately, our immigration service is powerless to waive the statutory waiting period for naturalization to take care of this unique situation. Consequently, Mr. Willrich, the San Diego Sockers, and our Olympic team have turned to Congress for help.

The Senate completed action on S. 2729 last Thursday (June 21, 1984). The Senate Judiciary Committee did consider this bill, but there just isn't time for S. 2729 to wind its way through House committee referral. I have been in contact with House Judiciary Committee and Immigration Subcommittee members. They have reviewed this issue, and have no contention with passing S. 2729 by unanimous consent. This action is not meant to establish precedent on acceleration of immigration cases but is a special unique case.

In sum, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support Mr. Willrich's reasonable request. By advancing his eligibility date we merely acknowledge the inevitable under the immigration code, but we greatly enhance our prospects for an Olympic medal this summer.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Jean Wilhelm Willrich shall be held and considered to have satisfied the residence and physical presence requirements of section 319(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FOOD FOR PEACE DAY

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 306) to proclaim July 10, 1984, as "Food for Peace Day," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 306

Whereas the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 (Public Law 480) was signed into law by President Eisenhower on July 10, 1954;

Whereas the Public Law 480 program (also known as the food for peace program) has received strong and bipartisan support from every President and Congress during the past thirty years as a versatile tool to use the abundant agricultural productivity of the United States to combat hunger and malnutrition abroad, expand export markets for United States agricultural commodities, encourage economic development in developing countries, and promote in other ways the foreign policy of the United States;

Whereas over three hundred million tons of agricultural commodities and products thereof valued at about $34,000,000,000 have been distributed to more than one hundred and fifty countries under the Public Law 480 program since its inception, substantially reducing world hunger and improving nutritional standards;

Whereas the Public Law 480 program has served as an example to other nations and encouraged them also to help meet food needs abroad by making available agricultural surpluses or cash donations for such purposes; and

Whereas the people of the United States remain dedicated to the high goals and purposes of the Public Law 480 program and committed to continuation of its important work: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That July 10, 1984, the thirtieth anniversary of Public Law 480, is hereby proclaimed as "Food for Peace Day", and the President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States and Federal and State governmental agencies to commemorate Food for Peace Day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of Senate Joint Resolution 306, which commemorates the 30th anniversary of the signing into law of Public Law 480, better known as Food for Peace. It was on July 10, 1954, that this important law took effect, and its provisions have served this world well for the last three decades. Furthermore, I applaud the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] and the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA], for his introduction of this measure, and I was pleased to be able to lend my cosponsorship to this most worthy legislation.

It has been stated by the Presidential Commission on World Hunger that "food aid has long been a major component of U.S. development assistance * * *" and "can be credited with saving many lives." For the last 30 years the Food for Peace Program has striven to provide humanitarian assistance, spur economic development within recipient countries, develop markets for U.S. agricultural commodities, and promote U.S. foreign policy objectives. Our changing world economy has constantly identified new markets for the Food for Peace Program, and it has undergone changes since it was first authorized.

Public Law 480 has had the strong support of both parties in Congress, as well as every President since its inception. Combating hunger both at home and abroad has been given a much higher priority of late, evidence of which is the very recent establishment by the House of the Select Committee on Hunger, which I was pleased to sponsor. In the three decades of the Food for Peace Program, over 300 million metric tons of agricultural commodities have been distributed to over 150 countries. This is clear evidence of the great humanitarianism and concern for others demonstrated by the American people. As we approach a celebration of our own Independence Day, we can take pride in what has been accomplished to alleviate hunger in this world in the last 30 years. With the commemoration of this anniversary, we can look ahead to the day when this program will be no longer necessary, as hunger will have been obliterated from this Earth. But for now, House Joint Resolution 572 deserves our earnest support, and accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I urge its support by our colleagues.●

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ILLINOIS AND MICHIGAN CANAL NATIONAL HERITAGE CORRIDOR ACT OF 1984

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 746) to establish the Illinois and Michigan Canal National Heritage Corridor in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment to the House amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment to the House amendment, as follows:

Page 30, of the House engrossed amendment, strike out all after line 6 over to and including line 12 on page 42 and insert:

The additional acreage authorized by this section is in recognition of the historical significance of the Memorial site to the westward expansion of the United States and the historical linkage of this site on the Mississippi in both Missouri and Illinois to such expansion, the international recognition of the Gateway Arch, designed by Eero Saarinen, as one of the world's great sculptural and architectural achievements, and the increasing use of the Memorial site by millions of people from all over the United States and the world.

In the development, management, and operation of that portion of the Memorial which is added to the Memorial under section 4, the Secretary shall, to the maximum extent feasible, utilize the assistance of State and local government agencies and the private sector. For such purposes, the Secretary may, consistent with the management plan for the area, enter into cooperative agreements with the State, with any political subdivision of the State, or with any person. Any such cooperative agreement shall, at a

SEC. 203. This title may be cited as the "Jefferson National Expansion Memorial Amendments Act of 1984".

Mr. SEIBERLING (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment to the House amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but I simply on my reservation would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio what he proposes to do here.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORCORAN. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, S. 746 a bill to establish the Illinois and Michigan Canal National Heritage Corridor, passed the House on February 28, 1984. The House-passed version substituted the provisions the companion bill, H.R. 2014, that had earlier been reported by the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

The House-passed bill contained two titles. Title I would establish a 100-mile national heritage corridor along the historic Illinois and Michigan Canal between Chicago and LaSalle/Peru, IL. The heritage corridor would be administered by a 19-member Commission with technical and financial assistance from the National Park Service, including up to $250,000 annually for the Commission itself.

Title II of the House-passed bill incorporated an amended version of H.R. 2107, to authorize the expansion of the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial [JNEM] in St. Louis, IL. Title II would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to manage up to 100 acres of a designated 350 acres of the waterfront in East St. Louis. Up to $1 million could be spent for land acquisition, and up to $750,000 for development of visitor facilities.

The versions of the legislation which was approved by the Senate today (yesterday), does not change the provisions of title I, dealing with the Illinois and Michigan Canal. It does, however, make a number of significant changes in title II of the bill, concerning the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial.

As amended by the Senate, title II would authorize the Secretary of the Interior of acquire no more than 100 acres in East St. Louis, MO. No provisions are made concerning the other 250 acres that had been included in the House bill.

The Memorial Commission established by the act would include the Secretary of the Interior on it—rather than being simply advisory to the Secretary—and would be solely responsible for developing a development and management plan for the East St. Louis portion of the memorial. The plan would be submitted, within 2 years, to the Secretary, rather than to the Congress.

Before approving the plan, the Secretary would have to make certain findings including the existence of, "certain binding commitments," from other sources, for any additional funding for land acquisition and development, other than funds authorized in the act. Binding commitment would also be required for all costs in excess of $350,000 per year for the management, operation, and protection of the East St. Louis portion of the memorial. Notice of the Secretary's certification of these commitments would be required to be sent to the authorizing committees in the House and Senate.

The Senate version does retain the $1 million for land acquisition. It also increases the authorization for development from $750,000 to $1,250,000; the additional $500,000 is earmarked for landscaping. The Senate version further stipulates, however, that none of the funds may be appropriated prior to the approval by the Secretary of the plan developed by the Commission.

Mr. Speaker, while I find the Senate changes in the bill to be more restrictive than seems necessary—considering that the House-passed version already represented a sizable compromise from the bill as introduced—I do support its final passage. It has been 4 months since the House passed this bill. Now that the other body has finally acted, I do not wish to cause any further delays.

I would simply conclude by noting that both titles of the bill are meritorious in concept. I am convinced that, once these areas are authorized, the Federal, State, and local entities involved—both in the public and the private sectors—will make them successful. Not only Illinois but our Nation as a whole will be richer for this legislation. I urge Members to support it.

Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Ohio not only for his assistant in this respect but also his explanation of the bill.

This makes no adjustment whatsoever, as I understand it, I would say to my friend and colleague from Ohio, on title I. It does make a change with respect to title II requiring an examination and study by the Department before any acquisition funds are expended.

We think that is a desirable thing to do, and so certainly I would not object.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the amendment now pending to S. 746, the Illinois and Michigan Canal National Heritage Corridor Act of 1984. This amendment applies to title II of the bill and is an accommodation between the gentlemen from Illinois [Messrs. PRICE and SIMON] and Senators PERCY and MCCLURE, along with the chairman of the subcommittee now managing the bill, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING]. The amendment, in no way, affects the intent of title I of the bill as originally passed by the House on February 28. This title is similar to the bill which I and all of my colleagues from Illinois introduced on March 9, 1983. Title I of this bill would establish the national heritage corridor in Illinois and a commission to coordinate activities within the area. The bill also releases most Federal lands and interests associated with the canal to the State of Illinois. Additionally, the title provides for a Commission staff and a $250,000 annual authorization for the 10-year life of the Commission. The bill specifies that designation of the corridor does not impose any change in current environmental standards or other regulations.

I am pleased that the House is taking final action on this important and precedent-setting legislation tonight which will clear the measure for the President's signature. This is certainly a dream come true for all of us who have been involved in this effort.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORCORAN. Further reserving the right to object, I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'BRIEN].

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

This will be of extraordinary benefit to our area both recreationally and as a job producer.

I share the view of my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, that this is a shining example of what we can do in a bipartisan way, and I express my thanks to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CORCORAN. Further reserving my right to object, Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to agree with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'BRIEN], has said. We certainly want to acknowledge the Federal recognition. Illinois is not a State that is blessed with a tremendous amount of Federal recognition when it comes to parks. But we appreciate the assistance.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORCORAN. Further reserving my right to object, I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to thank the chairman of the subcommittee for his hard work on this issue and his trips to Illinois, but especially I want to congratulate my tow colleagues, Mr. CORCORAN and Mr. O'BRIEN, for this very significant accomplishment in north Illinois.

I know all of the citizens of that part of the State are very grateful to the both of you for your hard work, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORCORAN. Further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. CORCORAN, Mr. O'BRIEN, and Mr. MADIGAN] for their leadership in this legislation which is extremely important to protecting the historic heritage of the people along this canal corridor and providing the potential recreation resource for the people of the entire northern Illinois area.

I also wish to commend Congressman PAUL SIMON of Illinois for his part, particularly in adding title II, the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial.

I think this is an excellent example of bipartisanship in trying to preserve our heritage.

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, 4 months ago, the House approved H.R. 2014, to establish the Illinois and Michigan Canal National Heritage Corridor in northeastern Illinois and to authorize the expansion of the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial [JNEM] in St. Louis, MO, to the Illinois side of the Mississippi River. The bill then was sent to the other body, where changes were made to title II of the bill. Title II authorizes the expansion of the JNEM.

I was a cosponsor of the original legislation introduced by my colleague, TOM CORCORAN, to establish the Illinois and Michigan Canal, as well as a close partner with my colleague MEL PRICE on the legislation he has long advocated to expand the JNEM. While both projects deal with land in Illinois, both do not seek the same objectives.

The Illinois and Michigan Canal measure calls for no major Federal role in land acquisition or in operation and maintenance. A Federal, 19-member commission is created and its functions are to market the resources of the corridor and to assist in raising funds for projects to further develop the recreational potential of the canal and the Des Plaines River Valley. The Interior Department will provide technical assistance in the form of interpretive studies, feasibility studies, and fundraising consultation. The heritage corridor will be the first nationally designated recreation area in Illinois.

On the other hand, the JNEM expansion will become part of an already existing park. The park created in Illinois should be treated exactly the same as any other park, with the same benefits—no more and no less. However, the other body made changes to title II of the bill which make it inferior to the House-passed version. The House bill was superior for three reasons:

First, it would have allowed for immediate land acquisition. The bill before us today says that no funds "may be appropriated prior to the approval by the Secretary of the plan developed by the Commission." The commission has 2 years to complete its plan. Land prices on the East St. Louis riverfront will only escalate during these 2 years. Nor is there doubt about the location of this parkland, which is to be directly across from the Gateway Arch. To delay land acquisition is unwise and can only set back the completion date of this important project while escalating its per parcel land-acquisition costs.

Second, it did not prescribe a level of operating expenses. To identify operating expenses before the plan is completed and before the scope of the park is known is premature and highly unusual. Charters of other national parks do not identify operating expenses. It is an unwise addition to the bill that incurs somewhat the same risks as buying a pair of shoes for a stranger.

Third, both measures limit the size of the park to 100 acres, but the House bill was superior in that it would have allowed the Park Service to take advantage of the willingness of many civic-minded individuals in the area who may have wanted to donate additional property. The land could have been accepted by the Park Service and then conveyed to third parties for compatible development.

It is unfortunate that the legislation sent to us by the other body strips title II of much of its desired flexibility. But all of us in our area are well aware of the fate that earlier threatened this legislation, and our sentiments today are dominated by great relief that both of these long-awaited developments—the Illinois and Michigan Canal Corridor and the JNEM expansion—can at last become reality. I urge my colleagues to accept these changes.

I would like to mention a provision in title II, in which I take particular interest. Both the Secretary of Interior and the 20-member advisory commission are directed by the bill to take into account the National Park Service study, now underway, on the feasibility of a museum of American ethnic culture to be part of the park. I strongly believe in the merits of such a museum, which would spotlight the variety of cultures, religious, and ethnic backgrounds that are part of our national heritage. There is no more appropriate location for such a national treasure than on the banks of our Nation's mightiest waterway and in the shadow of the Gateway Arch, a vital symbol of our national spirit.

Both projects—the I&M Canal and the JNEM expansion—have the ability to spark economic revitalization in the surrounding, depressed areas; both projects enjoy strong local support; and both projects will enjoy solid, talented commissions to ensure their individual successes.

I want to thank supporters of the Illinois and Michigan Canal project who have remained patient throughout the time in which changes were made by the other body to title II of the bill. We will now have two projects that will be of benefit to all Illinoisans.

Finally, I want to thank the chairman of the subcommittee, JOHN SEIBERLING, for his strong and skillful leadership on this legislation. I hope that he will continue to play an active role as Congress oversees the implementation of these measures in the years ahead.●

Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

ESTABLISHING A BOUNDARY FOR THE BLACK CANYON OF THE GUNNISON NATIONAL MONUMENT

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 3825) to establish a boundary for the Black Canyon of the Gunnison National Monument, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary is authorized to acquire lands or interests therein within the boundary of the Monument by donation, exchange, or purchase with donated or appropriated funds. The Secretary may acquire less than fee interests in such lands in cases where such interest will adequately protect the visual quality, natural, or cultural resources of the Monument: Provided, That the Secretary shall not acquire lands in fee interest unless the owner of such land concurs with such action.

(2) Page 5, line 1, strike out "Service" and insert: "System".

Mr. SEIBERLING (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further reading of the Senate amendments, and that they be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the House passed H.R. 3825 on March 5, 1984, and I am very pleased the other body was able to act so expeditiously on this legislation.

Since we passed this bill one of the six landowners within the new boundary established by the bill—whose property abuts the north rim of this magnificent canyon—has started to subdivide. Anyone who has had the experience of viewing the Black Canyon of the Gunnison has also looked across to the typical western tableland and wide open vistas. The landowner in question would provide us, instead, a view of houses built along the canyon edge. Because of the potential problems created by this action we need to enact this legislation now.

The Senate changes are very minor; they change three words. The House bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to acquire interests in land within the boundaries of the monument and the Senate changes simply take out the words "and directed" so it is now an authorizing rather than a mandating bill.

The other changes are basically conforming changes. That is all there is to it. I do think it is important that we act promptly.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the gentleman from Ohio for his explanation and for his prompt action on this measure. It is clear that this needs to be expedited if this beautiful area is to be saved.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend Congressman RAY KOGOVSEK, author of this bill, and "HANK" BROWN for their help and assistance in getting this bill put in this kind of shape and protecting a very important national monument.

Anyone who has been there can testify it is one of the real treasures of our National Park System.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

ENERGY INDUSTRY DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1983

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 3169) to amend the Energy Policy and Conservation Act to facilitate commerce by the domestic renewable energy industry and related service industries, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from New York to explain the minor change made in the House-passed bill.

I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, the change is very minor, but I think it is constructive. It merely changes the lead agency of this bill, which is to promote the exports of solar energy, from the Department of Commerce to the Department of Energy.

I congratulate the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WYDEN] for his leadership.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, since this is merely a technical change, that we would have agreed to in conference, this expedites passage of the bill, so we do not have to go to conference.

Mr. Speaker, on that assurance, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides a systematic way to promote our renewable energy industry's products—such as photovoltaics, cogeneration equipment, and wind energy equipment—and services overseas.

An assertive trade policy in the renewable energy sector—one that is consistent with our free trade stance and with international trade agreements—is essential to preserving our present market preeminence.

The vitality of our domestic renewable energy industry hinges on international market development, and the competition is fierce and growing more so all the time.

Though a growing worldwide market exists for renewable energy technologies and related services, America is increasingly losing ground to its competitors.

Though our technology is often superior, the aggressive marketing practices of our competitors clearly indicate the growing importance of marketing skills and investment strategy over that of technology.

H.R. 3169 forms the basis for a comprehensive marketing strategy for the U.S. renewable energy industry—a strategy that does not distort free market competition or violate international agreements.

H.R. 3169 devotes existing resources within the U.S. Government to develop a better understanding of the competitive strengths and disadvantages of American renewable energy industries, to better understand the Government intervention abroad that seriously affects trade and investment flows, and to ensure timely communication of potential market opportunities to U.S. businesses by many U.S. agencies that have overseas operations.

In short, the bill insures that we will now develop a comprehensive program for identifying strengths and weaknesses in U.S. competitiveness in the renewable energy industry field and develop a strategy for improvement.

Our stake in maintaining a healthy industry in this sector is clear. It is equally clear that overseas markets are of growing significance to the health of our industry, and that we have arrived at the point where we need to be organizationally equipped to provide the kind of leadership necessary to give assertive direction to the development and implementation of a trade policy in this sector.

Today, the American worker and American industry faces global markets and intense foreign competition. The bill is intended to get the United States to think coherently about our trade objectives and goals in this sector. We must begin now to define what our national interest is in renewable energy technology and services trade and how best to achieve it.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the gentleman from New York, Mr. OTTINGER, for his strong and continued leadership in developing our Nation's renewable energy resources. I also wish to thank the gentleman from California, Mr. MOORHEAD, for his support for this legislation and Senator HATFIELD for his support and for his leadership in steering this bill through the other body.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 5603, ALCOHOL ABUSE AND DRUG ABUSE, AND MENTAL HEALTH AMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 5603) to amend the Public Health Service Act to revise and extend the authorities of that act for assistance for alcohol and drug abuse and mental health services and to revise and extend the Developmental Disabilities Assistance and Bill of Rights Act, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WALKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman is just going to conference on this?

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am doing this for the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN] and it is to go to conference.

Mr. WALKER. It is going to conference?

Mr. OTTINGER. Yes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? The Chair hears none and, without objection, appoints the following conferees: Messrs. DINGELL, WAXMAN, SCHEUER, BROYHILL, and MADIGAN.

CONDEMNING CLOSING OF ABC COLOR NEWSPAPER IN PARAGUAY

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 331) condemn the closing of ABC Color, the only independent newspaper in Paraguay, and to urge the Government of Paraguay to permit the reopening of that newspaper and to guarantee freedom of the press, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask for the reservation simply to permit the gentleman to express the intent of the bill.

I yield to the gentleman from Maryland:

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, House Concurrent Resolution 331 is a sense of Congress resolution condemning the closing of ABC Color, the only independent newspaper in Paraguay, and urging the Government of Paraguay to permit the reopening of the newspaper and to guarantee freedom of the press. This resolution is cosponsored by the ranking minority member of the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee, Mr. LAGOMARSINO, and is supported by the administration. I know of no opposition to this resolution.

Paraguay has the dubious distinction of having one of the longest living military dictatorships in Latin America. Gen. Alfredo Stroessner has been in power for 30 years. And while the winds of democracy are being felt throughout the region, the military regime becomes even more repressive in Paraguay. In this vacuum of political freedom, ABC Color has provided a small window of truth for the Paraguayan people.

ABC Color was established in 1967 as a source of independent and reliable information for the people of Paraguay. Despite constant censorship it survived. But on May 11, 1983, its offices were surrounded by troops. Its editor, Aldo Zuccolillo, was later arrested. On September 23, 1983, one of the newspaper's leading editorialists, Alcibiades Gonzalez de Valle, was arrested. In other attempts to restrict the newspaper, the Government last year restricted newsprint supply, resulting in a forced reduction on the number of pages. and finally on March 22, of this year, the Interior Minister gave the order to permanently close ABC Color. Just days before, on March 16, Mr. Zuccolillo had been once again arrested.

This attack against ABC Color is part of a comprehensive campaign against the independent press in Paraguay and against the return of democracy to that country. While other military regimes give way to elected civilian governments in South America, the Stroessner regime finds new ways of restricting freedoms. The military realizes that, like in the case of Argentina, the democratic ideals of the people will eventually triumph. Because of its fear that its corruption, its repression, and its inability to govern will force the people to press for a democratic path, the military regime tightens its grip on the population. ABC Color was one of the mirrors of these democratic ideals, but now it has been silenced.

Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Embassy in Asuncion has protested the closing of ABC Color and the actions taken against its personnel. We have a chance tonight to support both our Government and those in Latin America who are striving to preserve and extend freedom of the press. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

Mr. BEREUTER. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Maryland, that the chairman of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs is certainly entirely accurate on this matter. It is endorsed by the administration, has been reviewed by all the senior members of the minority and this Member, and we strongly endorse its passage.

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the sponsors of this resolution—Representative MIKE BARNES, chairman of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs; his ranking minority member, Mr. LAGOMARSINO; and Mr. GEJDENSON—for bringing this issue to the attention of the House and of the American people.

There can be no question but that freedom of the press is one of the fundamental bases for a healthy, democratic society. The forced closing of the newspaper ABC Color on March 22, 1984, together with the earlier Government pressures on the paper, is a serious violation of the basic rights of the people of the nation to be able to express their views and to be informed of events both within and outside their country. An attack against this basic freedom is, in effect, an attack against the citizens of Paraguay.

It is important that the United States place itself squarely in opposition to such action and that the U.S. Government urge the Government of Paraguay to reverse this heinous decision.

I urge the Members to support this resolution.●

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution as follows.

H. CON. RES. 331

Whereas ABC Color, the only independent newspaper in Paraguay, has been in publication for the past 17 years;

Whereas the Government of Paraguay has carried out a campaign against ABC Color, including the denial of permits to import newsprint and the frequent arrests of its staff;

Whereas on March 22, 1984, ABC Color was indefinitely closed by order of the Interior Minister and its premises searched;

Whereas this action has been widely condemned in Paraguay;

Whereas the United States Embassy in Paraguay protested the government's action against ABC Color;

Whereas with the closure of ABC Color, the people of Paraguay have no means of acquiring independent and reliable information; and

Whereas freedom of the press is the foundation of a free and healthy society, and an attack against this freedom is an attack against society: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress condemns the closing of ABC Color, the only independent newspaper in Paraguay, and urges the Government of Paraguay to permit the reopening of that newspaper and to guarantee freedom of the press.

CONGRESSIONAL TRIBUTE TO U.S. NAVY SEABEES: MARCH 5 PROCLAIMED SEABEE DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, during the dark early days of World War II a unique military institution was born to meet the construction needs of America and our allies on the road to victory over the Axis Powers. On March 5, 1942, here in Washington, DC, the Seabees of the U.S. Navy were officially established.

From that day forward, the Seabees of the Navy have been one of the great military organizations in the world. It was a part of the proud tradition of the Seabees of World War II that we paved the way to victory. As a young man I was proud to serve in that organization during the campaigns in the Pacific. I still maintain a tie to the Seabees through my activities on the Seabee Memorial Scholarship Association which is a group of present and former Seabees who raise funds to provide scholarship assistance to worthy students whose fathers have served with the Seabees through the years.

I am proud to take this special order to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the Congress, and to the American people, the fact that the Seabees are still a strong and viable part of our Navy, and still hold an honored place in the hearts of Americans all across this great Nation.

Today there are a total of eight naval mobile construction battalions on active duty providing the Navy with construction support all around the globe. In recent years we have seen Navy Seabees in places such as Diego Garcia and the South Pole, as well as doing sensitive construction work at American Embassies throughout the world.

We also have an impressive Reserve naval construction force made up of eight Reserve naval construction regiments with a total of 17 Reserve naval mobile construction battalions. Together with a number of smaller units which will report to existing active duty units upon mobilization, and new Seabee hospital units which will augment fleet hospitals, our Reserve Seabees now number nearly 15,000 and make up more than two-thirds of our naval construction assets. They are commanded by Rear Adm. Thomas S. Maddock, C.E.C., USNR, from his headquarters at the Marine Corps Air Station at El Toro, CA.

Mr. Speaker, while we who served in the Seabees during time of war will always be proud of our fine combat record, there is another side of the Seabee story which reflects equal honor on this unique organization. Two decades ago President John F. Kennedy founded the Peace Corps based on a belief that Americans could best help the poor and the disadvantaged people around the world by extending a helping hand to teach them how to help themselves. For more than 40 years Seabees have practiced exactly that philosophy wherever they have gone. America has reaped a wonderful harvest of trust and affection from the tireless efforts of those willing ambassadors in Seabee greens.

In the May issue of the VFW magazine there was an excellent story by Charles P. Clarke entitled "We Build, We Fight, Can Do," and I include the article in the RECORD following my remarks.

Before closing Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to thank Lt. Comdr. Dave Clement for his help in putting this tribute together. He has been a frequent and very eloquent spokesman for both Seabees and the Navy in many forums, and I thank him for his efforts in this and many other projects.

Mr. Speaker, let me say in closing, that America has been blessed by an abundance of men who have served this Nation with honor and with distinction as Seabees for the past 42 years. For the future I would pray that a mighty and merciful God will continue to grant this great Nation men with strong hands and willing hearts who will be dedicated to building a strong America today, and a better world for tomorrow, and finally, let us pray that we will always have men of vision who will always have a reach which will exceed their grasp.

The article follows:

WE BUILD, WE FIGHT, CAN DO

(By Charles P. Clarke)

"The only trouble with the Seabees is that we don't have enough of them."—Gen. Douglas A. MacArthur, Supreme Commander, Allied Forces, Pacific, World War II.

When the Seabees first landed on Guadalcanal in August, 1942, Marines on the island often joked, "Never hit a Seabee. He could be a Marine's father."

Or grandfather. In World War II, the average age of the more than 325,000 men of the Navy's Construction Battalions was 37, and some were over 50. But the "ConBats," as they first were called, quickly won the respect and admiration of the millions of soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines who fought from Guadalcanal to Tokyo, from North Africa to Rome and from Normandy to Berlin. Indeed, the several roads to victory in World War II were paved, literally, by the gutsy guys in green fatigues and upturned baseball-type caps who became known far and wide as the Seabees.

"Construimus, Battuimus (We Build, We Fight), Can Do!" was the Seabees' proud motto. And do they did—from Pearl Harbor to the wars in Korea and Vietnam and, more recently, alongside their old friends, the Marines, in Lebanon.

Last November, soon after the Marines' headquarters at Beirut airport were demolished by a suicide truckbomb attack, 80 men of the Seabees' Mobile Construction Battalion No. 1 came ashore to help build new fortified positions and facilities for the embattled Leathernecks. They didn't leave until the Marines themselves were redeployed in February to ships off shore.

The Seabees' roster now totals a peacetime 12,500 men, comprising eight battalions divided between Port Hueneme, Calif., and Gulfport, Miss. But contingents of Seabee reserves continue to train as part of the Naval Reserve Construction Force program. Though most of today's Seabees are in their early 20s, they are imbued with the "Can Do" tradition of their World War II predecessors that began with the Seabees' authorization as a full-fledged branch of the Navy on March 5, 1942, under Rear Adm. Ben Morrell, the Navy's chief civil engineer and head of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, otherwise known as—the "King Bee."

The Seabees like to tell how they sometimes got to Japanese-held islands ahead of the Marines. For example, when the Leathernecks charged ashore on enemy-occupied New Georgia in the Pacific at dawn on June 21, 1943, who should emerge from the jungle but an advance detachment of Seabees, surveying sites for a new airfield.

"The Seabees are always happy to welcome the Marines," said smiling Lt. Robert L. Ryan, commander of Construction Battalion No. 47.

Later in the war, when 600 Marines with fixed bayonets stormed ashore on Rota in the Marianas, they were greeted by a sign saying: "The 48th CBs Welcome the Marines to Rota." Though outnumbered 100 to 1 by the island's Japanese garrison, a 35-man Seabee detachment had gone ashore three days earlier to begin work on a variety of construction projects.

In retrospect, the World War II achievements of the Seabees stagger the imagination. Drawn largely from the construction trades, the Seabees included carpenters, plumbers, electricians, welders, machinists, steamfitters, ironworkers. They had built bridges and dams, roads and waterworks, erected skyscrapers, dug tunnels, strung power lines. Now, with the military, they were sweating airfields, fuel depots, ship-to-shore causeways, you-name-it. When necessary, they switched from tools to carbines and fought like tigers with combat skills taught by Marine instructors.

Following the Marines ashore on Guadalcanal in August, 1942, the Seabees helped hold a narrow beachhead against human-wave enemy attacks. Meanwhile, they converted a muddy, Japanese-built airstrip into Henderson Field, a key, all-weather facility capable of supporting everything from Marine fighters to B-17 bombers.

How they kept the field open and operating under nearly constant enemy bombardment and shellfire is a story of rare courage and ingenuity. The Seabees stockpiled Marston matting (pierced steel planking used as runway surfacing) at strategic points on the field, along with trucks loaded with sand and gravel. After Japanese planes bombed the airfield, Seabees "crater crews" would dash from their foxholes and, in assembly-line fashion, quickly repair the damage. Within 40 minutes of an enemy bombing run, Henderson was good as new and back in business.

During one particularly hot firefight, when the Japanese pushed to within 150 feet of the airfield perimeter, Seabee Lawrence Meyer unlimbered a .30 caliber machine gun he had salvaged and repaired, mounted it on the edge of his foxhole and calmly shot down one of the attacking enemy planes.

Improvisation and ingenuity came naturally to the Seabees. When an enemy pillbox blocked an American advance on a Treasury Island beachhead, First-Class Petty Officer Aurelio Tassone, of Milford, Mass., raised the blade of his Seabee bulldozer as a shield and, amid a hail of pinging bullets, rumbled forward, lowered the blade on the pillbox and demolished it.

Seabees in the Ellice Islands, lacking a replacement for a blown out bulldozer head gasket, fashioned a makeshift part from thin sheets of metal and paper and quickly put the dozer back in service. A Seabee chief on Samoa jury-rigged a replacement condenser out of waxed paper, tinfoil from cigarette packages and an old beer can to keep another tracked vehicle going. Other Seabees learned how by mounting fuel drums in place of smashed radiators.

The standard, 55-gallon fuel drum, in fact, had a variety of uses. With the ends cut off, the drums were welded together and converted into culverts. One group of Seabees even made a joyriding canoe out of empty fuel drums.

Worn out tires were kept rolling by filling them with a mixture of palm tree sawdust and cement. Beer and Coke bottles were used as insulators for power and telephone lines. Perhaps the most useful Seabee invention of all was a modular steel pontoon, five-by-seven-by five feet, devised by Capt. John N. Laycock. The adaptable pontoon, or "magic box" as it was called, soon was in mass production for a multitude of uses in the Navy's vast amphibious operations. A Seabee cook in the Russell Islands even converted a pair of the pontoons into an oven and grill.

Later, Capt. Laycock's "magic boxes" were used in assembling the huge pontoon barges that ferried cargo ashore on the beaches of Normandy. Each barge consisted of 180 pontoons, assembled into a configuration measuring six pontoons wide and 30 pontoons long, and powered by two large outboard motors. A specially developed loading and unloading ramp was installed at one end. Each of the pontoon craft could transport half an LST load of supplies and the equipment over shallow water and onto the beaches of quick unloading.

A Navy pilot, spotting the strange-looking contraption being tested at Quonset, R.I., said it looked for all the world like a rhinoceros. "Rhino ferry" soon became the unofficial name of this Seabee innovation that helped supply the beaches of Normandy on D-Day and beyond.

By all measurements, World War II marked not only history's darkest period of destruction but also its era of mightiest construction. In both the Atlantic and Pacific theaters, the Seabees built more than 400 advanced military bases at a cost of nearly 11 billion in 1940-45 dollars. In the Pacific alone, the Seabees built 111 major airfields, 441 piers, 700 square blocks of warehouses, storage tanks for 100 million gallons of gasoline, hospitals to serve 70,000 patients and housing for 1.5 million men.

Among their most prodigious feats was construction of the world's largest airbase on Tinian for use by America's new fleet of B-29s against the Japanese homeland less than 2,000 miles away. Beginning the summer of 1944, and even before the Marines had secured the island, an army of some 15,000 Seabees was at work day and night, building the six runways, each a mile and a half long, together with 11 miles of connecting taxiway and hardstand for 265 planes. Also erected on Tinian were nearly 1,000 buildings, miles of roads, fuel and ammunition storage facilities and utility systems for the huge base.

During the Tinian construction project, the Seabees blasted out enough coral rock to build three Hoover dams, using an average of 12 tons of dynamite a day. They also rolled our enough asphalt to pave a highway from New York to boston. And in the greatest superlative of all, the first of the gaint B-29 runways was completed in 53 days, thus hastening the end of the war.

For sheer heroics, the Seabees point to their construction of an roadway to the top of Mount Suribachi on Iwo Jima, in March, 1945. Someone had said it couldn't be done. But men of the Seabees' 31st Battalion had the "impossible" road open in 12 days, after a demolition team cleared the trail of mines and booby traps and after a bulldozer reached the top followed by graders, scrapers and dump trucks—all while the construction teams and the Marines battled Japanese snipers hidden on the slopes.

There were, of course, many other achievements along the islandhopping way to victory in the Pacific: the lonely island of Guam, 6,000 miles from the U.S., converted into a wartime metropolis with its harbor, Apra, becoming the second busiest port in the world, after Antwerp; a reef-bound basin at Canton Island dredged into a five-lane seaplane lagoon; Johnston Island doubled in size as the Seabees poured coral and concrete into the adjoining sea. In July, 1943, the Seabees' 47th Battalion fought tropical downpours, hip-deep mud and diehard Japanese defenders to complete an airstrip at Munda, New Georgia, in a record 10 days. The next month, joined by the 24th and 73rd battalions, Munda was converted into what Adm. William F. (Bull) Halsey called "the finest base in the South Pacific."

In one of the biggest construction jobs of the war, 50,000 Seabees teamed up with a like number of Army Engineers to turn the once sleepy island of Okinawa into a massive military base for the final assault on Japan. The project was half-completed when Japan surrendered, but the Seabees left calling cards everywhere on Okinawa, including 800 miles of modern highways, and a huge traffic circle in the heart of Kadena, the capital, that rivals the best of such designs anywhere in the world.

For all this, and more, the Seabees paid a heavy price: More than 300 combat deaths and over 2,000 Purple Hearts in the Pacific alone. But they had earned the distinction of serving in every amphibious operation of the war including duty on more than 300 islands and on five continents: Asia, Australia, North America, Europe and later in Antarctica.●

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts. He can indeed be proud of his service with the famous Seabees. This year marks the 42d anniversary of the founding of this fine organization, and it is appropriate that we honor all Seabees, past and present, here today.

The indomitable Seabees were born of great national need at the beginning of World War II when it was obvious that we would have to build ports and harbors, airfields and roads, facilities of every kind, and in all parts of the world, and that all of this construction would probably have to be accomplished under fire from the enemy.

Adm. Ben Moreel founded a military organization that has earned its motto, "Can Do." For more than 42 years the Seabees have served in every possible situation with great distinction, and I am proud to join this tribute.

Mr. Speaker, I insert the text of a proclamation of Gov. James Thompson making March 5, 1984, Seabees Day in the State of Illinois, and the text of a proclamation of Mayor Paul Schuler of Granite City, IL, which is in my congressional district, setting March 5 as Seabee Day in Granite City, in the RECORD at this point:

STATE OF ILLINOIS—PROCLAMATION

Whereas, the Seabees are the Navy's construction battalions, units whose "Can do" slogan exemplifies the true spirit of their members, whether it be in battle or in the repair or construction of facilities; and

Whereas, both Regular and Reserve Seabees, through their professionalism, knowledge of construction and individual skills have contributed to the freedom of the world; and

Whereas, since their founding, many citizens of Illinois have served that organization during peace and strife, fulfilling their motto, "With compassion for others we build—we fight for peace with freedom;" and

Whereas, it is fitting that the dedicated men and women who have been and are serving our country are given due recognition and appreciation;

Therefore, I, James R. Thompson, Governor of the State of Illinois, proclaim March 5, 1984, as Seabees Day in Illinois on the occasion of their 42nd anniversary.

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR, CITY OF GRANITE CITY, IL—PROCLAMATION

Whereas, there are certain days set aside by this great nation of ours whereby the citizens of this and other states pay homage to our Armed Forces; and

Whereas, on these occasions marked by celebration and prayer, the dedicated men and women who have been and are serving our country in its quest for freedom for all nations are given due recognition and appreciation; and

Whereas, one segment of our Armed Forces is the Navy's Construction Battalions, commonly known as the "Seabees" whose "Can Do" slogan exemplifies the true spirit of men whether it be in the height of battle or in the repair and construction of existing and new facilities; and

Whereas, the Seabees both Regular and Reserve through their professionalism, knowledge of construction and individual skills have contributed to the freedom of the world; and

Whereas, since the founding of the Navy Seabees on March 5, 1942, to the present time many citizens of our City of Granite City, Illinois have served that organization during peace and strife and through individual skill and expertise fulfilled their further motto "With Compassion for Others We Build—We Fight for Peace With Freedom";

Now therefore I Paul Schuler, Mayor of the City of Granite City, Illinois proclaim March 5, 1984, the 42nd Anniversary of the formation of the Naval Construction Battalion as "Seabee Day" in Granite City.●

● Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join the gentleman from Massachusetts in this special order. The Headquarters of the Reserve Naval Construction Force is located just a few miles from my congressional district at the Marine Corps Air Station-El Toro in Santa Ana, CA.

For the past 42 years the Seabees have been an essential part of our Navy-Marine Corps team. During World War II the Seabees built the harbors and docks over which the armed might of America reached the battlefields in far parts of the world. Seabees literally moved mountains and built airfields which exist to this very day. The construction skills of the Seabees are legendary, and their motto "Can Do" was earned under fire.

Just across the Memorial Bridge from the Lincoln Memorial here in Washington is a very moving monument to the Seabees which was created by the world famous artist, sculptor and former Seabee, Mr. Felix de Weldon, who also created the U.S. Marine Memorial nearby. While the Seabee Memorial recognizes their construction skills, and their fighting abilities, it also shows that the Seabees have also won fame for helping those who most need it. The Seabee Memorial shows an armed Seabee reaching out to help a small child. The courage and dedication that Seabees have given to this great Nation for over 42 years is typical of America at our best.

Mr. Speaker, I insert a proclamation of Dr. Thomas J. Clark, the mayor of the city of Long Beach, CA, designating March 1984 as "Seabee Month" in the city of Long Beach in the RECORD at this point, together with a proclamation by the Orange County supervisors making March 5, 1984, the 42d anniversary of the formation of the Naval Construction Battalions, as Seabee Day in Orange County, CA.

PROCLAMATION—LONG BEACH, CA, "THE INTERNATIONAL CITY"—SEABEE MONTH, MARCH 1984

Whereas, there are certain days set aside by this great Nation of ours whereby the citizens of this and other states pay homage to our Armed Forces; and

Whereas, on these occasions, marked by celebration and prayer, the dedicated men and women who have been and are serving our country in its quest for freedom for all nations are given due recognition and appreciation; and

Whereas, one segment of our Armed Forces is the Navy's Construction Battalions, commonly known as the "Seabees", whose famous "Can Do" slogan exemplifies the true spirit of men whether it be in the height of battle or in the repair and construction of facilities to support military operations; and

Whereas, the Seabees, both Regular and Reserve, through their professionalism, knowledge of construction and individual skills, contribute to the maintaining of the freedom of the world; and

Whereas, since the founding of the Navy Seabees on March 5, 1942 to the present time, many citizens of Long Beach, California have served that organization during peace and strife and, through individual skill and expertise, fulfilled their motto "With Compassion for Others We Build—We fight for Peace With Freedom"; and

Whereas, a detachment of the 18,000 man reserve, is located in Long Beach aboard the Long Beach Navy and Marine Corps Reserve Center;

Now, Therefore, I, Dr. Thomas J. Clark, Mayor of the City of Long Beach, with the consent of the City Council do hereby proclaim March 1984, Seabee Month in Long Beach. On behalf of the citizens of Long Beach, I extend congratulations upon the 42nd Anniversary of the formation of the Naval Construction Battalions.

PROCLAMATION—42D ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE SEABEES

Whereas, there are certain days set aside by this great Nation of ours whereby the citizens of this and other states pay homage to our Armed Forces; and

Whereas, on these occasions, marked by celebration and prayer, the dedicated men and women who have been and are serving our country in its quest for freedom for all nations are given due recognition and appreciation; and

Whereas, one segment of our Armed Forces is the Navy's Construction Battalions, commonly known as the "Seabees", whose famous "Can Do" slogan exemplifies the true spirit of men whether it be in the height of battle or in the repair and construction of facilities to support military operations; and

Whereas, the headquarters of the 18,000 man reserve, which commands Reserve Seabee units across this great land, is located in Orange County aboard Marine Corps Air Station, El Toro;

Now Therefore, The Orange County Supervisors proclaim March 5, 1984, the 42nd Anniversay of the formation of the Naval Construction Battalions, as "Seabee Day" in Orange County.●

● Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for inviting me to participate in this special order, and congratulate the gentleman for his affiliation with the Seabees.

Down in Georgia we feel particularly close to the Seabees since we have so many within our State. There are Reserve Seabee detachments located in Atlanta, Augusta, Columbus, and Savannah, and over the years Reserve Naval Mobile Construction Battalion 24 has been one of the best Seabee units in the Navy.

Mr. Speaker, our Governor, Joe Frank Harris, designated March 5, 1984, the 42d anniversary of the founding of the Navy Seabees as "Seabee Day" in Georgia.

For many years the Seabees have been known throughout the world as the greatest construction team ever organized. Through their dedication and courage they have made a name for themselves which will last forever. On the battlefields of World War II, in the snow of Korea, or in the jungles of Vietnam, Seabees could always be counted on to demonstrate their "Can Do" spirit.

In times of peace they have journeyed to the ends of the Earth to practice their construction skills inplaces such as the ice of the South Pole and on the coral islands such as Diego Garcia. As many Members of the House already know, Seabees also provide critical construction skills at American Embassies abroad where security cannot be ensured in other ways.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in honoring the Seabees of the Navy on their 42d anniversary and include the proclamation of Governor Harris at this point in the RECORD:

[By the Governor of the State of Georgia]

A PROCLAMATION: SEABEE DAY

Whereas: The Navy's Construction Battalions, commonly known as the Seabees, were formed on March 5, 1942; and

Whereas: Through their professionalism, knowledge of construction and individual skills, the Seabees have served our country in its quest for freedom for all nations; and

Whereas: Whether it be in the height of battle or in the repair and construction of existing and new facilities, the Seabees continue to demonstrate their patriotism, loyalty and devotion to duty; and

Whereas: During the month of March, 1984, Georgia Naval Reserve Seabees, members of the Third Reserve Naval Construction Regiment, Reserve Naval Officer-in-Charge of Construction Southern Europe, Reserve Naval Mobile Construction Battalions 24 and 14, Construction Battalion Center Gulfport, and Construction Battalion Hospital Unit Atlanta will depart for annual readiness training in keeping with the great tradition of Seabees worldwide; and

Whereas: This year marks the 42nd anniversary of the Seabees, and it is most fitting that the citizens of our state recognize these dedicated men and women who have provided for the common defense of our nation and have exemplified the true spirit of America; now

Therefore: I, Joe Frank Harris, Governor of the State of Georgia, do hereby proclaim the day of March 5, 1984, as "Seabee Day" in Georgia, and call upon all our citizens to join in paying tribute to these men and women who have responded to the call to service with honor and distinction.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Seal of the Executive Department to be affixed. This 23rd day of February, 1984.●

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues today in honoring the Seabees of the Navy on their 42d anniversary.

There are those who might say, what does someone from Colorado know about Seabees or the Navy? But the fact is that we in Colorado know quite a bit since we have our own Seabee Reserve detachment, and like Seabees everywhere, they are not only good builders, they are also good citizens.

Over the years they have done hundreds of days worth of essential construction work on civic projects such as the Colorado State Georgetown Loop Historic Mining Area, the Jefferson County Outdoor Laboratory and the Peaceful Valley Boy Scout Camp to name only a few of their many civic action projects.

Mr. Speaker, our Reserve Seabees in Colorado have proved that Seabees everywhere still live by the motto, "Can Do." And they have also proved to the citizens of Colorado that the training of the Seabee Reserves can, and does, benefit both the reservists and the local community.

We in Colorado are truly fortunate to have veterans and civilian patriots who now serve in the organized Seabee Reserve, and I include a proclamation of Colorado Gov. Richard D. Lamm naming March 2 to 5, 1984, as U.S. Navy Seabee and Civil Engineer Corps Days in the RECORD at this point:

PROCLAMATION: U.S. NAVY SEABEE AND CIVIL ENGINEER CORPS DAYS, MARCH 2 TO 5, 1984

Whereas, certain days are set aside, marked by celebration and prayer, when our nation pays homage to our Armed Forces so that the dedicated men and women in service to our country are given due recognition and appreciation; and

Whereas, one segment of our Armed Forces is the Navy's famous Construction Battalions, commonly known as the Seabees, whose "Can Do" slogan exemplifies the true spirit of its members in battle, construction and repair of military facilities and in support functions to the community; and

Whereas, the Seabees, led by officers of the Civil Engineer Corps, in both the regular and reserve components, have contributed to freedom of the world through their individual skills and construction abilities; and

Whereas, the Navy Civil Engineer Corps and the Navy Seabees—founded on March 2, 1867, and March 5, 1942, respectively—have served our country in peace and strife, following the motto "With Compassion for Others We build—We Fight for Peace with Freedom;" and

Whereas, Colorado is fortunate to have veterans and civilian patriots who now serve in the Organized Reserve; and

Whereas, our Colorado Seabees have left their mark on this state by providing construction expertise for many state and local projects such as the Colorado State Georgetown Loop Historic Mining Area, Jefferson County Outdoor Laboratory School and Peaceful Valley Boy Scout Camp, to name a few;

Now, therefore, I, Richard D. Lamm, Governor of the State of Colorado, do hereby proclaim March 2-5, 1984, as U.S. Navy Seabee and Civil Engineer Corps Days in the State of Colorado.●

● Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for inviting me to join him in this special order and I am proud to associate myself with the thoughts already offered.

Among our Armed Forces the Seabees have always been commonly known for their "Can Do" attitude. No job is ever too great, no challange ever too difficult, for the Navy Seabees.

Led today by the officers of the Navy Civil Engineer Corps under the command of Rear Adm. William Zobel, the chief of engineers, the Seabees continue to maintain their reputation worldwide as outstanding builders. They first proved their skills on Guadalcanal where they kept Henderson Field operational despite all of the efforts of a determined enemy to close the airstrip.

Seabees were responsible for the facilities that led to the successful invasions of North Africa and Europe, and built the airfields and advanced bases on each new island in the Pacific the Marines captured.

After the war they built bases in places such as Antartica before being deployed to support United Nations Forces in Korea. The jungles of Vietnam were a familiar place to Navy Seabees as they built bases for all branches of the Armed Forces.

Through their individual skills and expertise the Seabees have lived up to their moto, "With Compassion for Others We Build—We Fight for Peace with Freedom."

Mr. Speaker, I include the proclamation of Michigan Gov. James J. Blanchard naming March 5, 1984, as Seabees Day in Michigan in the RECORD at this point.

EXECUTIVE DECLARATION IN OBSERVANCE OF MARCH 5, 1984, AS SEABEES DAY

There are certain days set aside by this great nation of ours whereby the citizens of this and other states pay homage to our Armed Forces. On these occasions marked by celebration and prayer, the dedicated men and women who have been and are serving our country in its quest for freedom for all nations are given due recognition and appreciation.

One segment of our Armed Forces is the Navy's Construction Battalions, commonly known as the "Seabees" whose "can do" slogan exemplifies the true spirit of this unit whether it be in the height of battle or in the repair and construction of facilities.

The Seabees both Regular and Reserve through their professionalism, knowledge of construction, and individual skills have contributed to the freedom of the world.

Since the founding of the Navy Seabees on March 5, 1942 to the present time, many citizens of Michigan have served this organization during peace and strife. Through individual skill and expertise, they have fulfilled their future motto "With Compassion for Others We Build—We Fight for Peace with Freedom."

Therefore, I, James J. Blanchard, Governor of the State of Michigan, do hereby declare March 5, 1984, as Seabees Day in Michigan. I encourage all citizens to recognize the heroic achievements of these men and women and to congratulate the Seabees during this 42nd anniversary.●

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in honoring a great military institution today. In New York we have our own Seabee unit, Reserve Naval Mobile Construction Battalion 13, and several hundred members of the battalion come from New York City.

Mr. Speaker, the Navy Seabees, both active and reserve, are a critical part of our national defense. We have learned that in the modern world our ability to protect and defend our interests around the world depends to a large measure on our ability to move our military forces into an area and operate them effectively.

Today we must have the ability to repair damaged or destroyed facilities, and to build new ones immediately. That means we must have a force of trained and skilled constructionmen ready to move anywhere in the world, and that force is the Seabees.

I would also like to point out to my colleagues that over the years the Seabees have been a fertile training ground for young men right out of high school who have enlisted in the Navy in hopes of learning the construction trades while serving with the Seabees. Today the Naval Construction Training Schools at the Construction Battalion Centers at Gulfport, MS, and Port Hueneme, CA, are turning out hundreds of new construction men each year. As these young men complete their enlistments and return to the civilian work force they are a valuable addition to the construction industry. And when they join units like RNMCB-13 they become an essential part of America's strength in reserve.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to congratulate the Seabees on their 42d anniversary, and include a proclamation of Gov. Mario Cuomo of New York which set March 5 as Seabee Day in the State of New York, and a proclamation of New York Mayor Ed Koch proclaiming March 5, 1984, as Seabee Day in New York City in the RECORD at this point:

STATE OF NEW YORK

PROCLAMATION

There are certain days set aside by this great Nation whereby the citizens of this and other states pay homage to our Armed Forces.

On these occasions marked by celebration and prayer, the dedicated men and women who have been and are serving our country in its quest for freedom for all nations are given due recognition and appreciation.

One segment of our Armed Forces is the Navy's Construction Battalions, commonly known as the "Seabees," whose "CAN DO" slogan exemplifies their spirit, whether in the height of battle or in the repair and construction of existing and new facilities.

Since the founding of the Navy's Seabees on March 5, 1942, many citizens of our State have served that organization during peace and strife. Through individual skill and expertise, they have fulfilled their further motto "With Compassion for Others We Build—We Fight for Peace With Freedom."

During the month of March, currently over one thousand New York State Naval Reserve Seabees, members of Reserve Naval Mobile Construction Battalion Thirteen and units of Reserve Naval Mobile Construction Battalion Twelve and Twenty-Seven shall depart for annual readiness training in keeping with the great tradition of Seabees worldwide.

It is fitting that the 42nd anniversary of the formation of the Naval Construction Battalions be given due recognition and commendation.

Now, Therefore, I, Mario M. Cuomo, Governor of the State of New York, do hereby proclaim March 5, 1984, as Seabee Day in New York State.

CITY OF NEW YORK

PROCLAMATION

The "Seabees," the Navy's construction battalions, have served our country both on the battlefield and in times of peace and in the repair and construction on Navy facilities.

Founded on March 5, 1942, the Seabees, both regular and reserve, demonstrate professionalism, knowledge of construction and individual skills which fulfill their motto "With Compassion for Others We Build—We Fight for Peace With Freedom." During this month, several hunderd New York City Naval Reserve Seabees, members of Reserve Naval Mobile Construction Battalion thirteen, depart for annual readiness training in keeping with the tradition of Seabees worldwide.

Now, therefore, I, Edward I. Koch, mayor of the city of New York, do hereby proclaim March 5, 1984, as "Seabee day" in New York City, in recognition of the 42d anniversary of the formation of the Naval Construction Battalions.●

● Mr. SISISKY. Mr. Speaker, Virginia is the home of the Seabees of Reserve Naval Mobile Construction Battalion 23. And while I am aware that this is the same battalion that the gentleman from Massachusetts served in during World War II in the Pacific, I am sure that he would agree with me that it is an outstanding military unit.

Over the years the Seabees of RNMCB-23 have contributed a great deal to the people of Virigina. One example of the civic action projects which they have undertaken was the construction of the Boy Scout Camp at Goshen, VA, which is the largest Scout camp in the Eastern United States and which is used by thousands of Scouts each year.

The people of Viriginia also have a strong historical attachment to the Seabees since many of the first Seabees during World War II took most of their training near Williamsburg. Today the headquarters of the commander of the naval construction battalions, U.S. Atlantic Fleet, is located in the great naval complex in Norfolk, VA.

The Reserve Seabees of the 8th Reserve Naval Construction Regiment which includes RNMCB-21 from the Naval Air Station at Lakehurst, NJ, and Virginia's own RNMCB-23, from Fort Belvoir, VA, have just completed two difficult and demanding weeks at the Marine Corps Development and Education Center at Quantico, VA, where they received advanced military training. During this time they honed their military and construction skills to ensure that they will be ready to answer the call if the Nation needs them.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in honoring these skilled builders and dedicated patriots on the occasion of their 42d anniversary. I include a proclamation of Mayor Sidney M. Oman of Chesapeake, VA, in my congressional district, naming March 5, 1984, as Seabee Day in Chesapeake into the RECORD at this point.

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, There are certain days set aside by this great nation of ours whereby the citizens of this and other states pay homage to our Armed Forces; and,

Whereas, On these occasions marked by celebration and prayer, the dedicated men and women who have been and are serving our country in its quest for freedom for all nations are given due recognition and appreciation; and,

Now, Therefore, I, Sidney M. Oman, Mayor of the City of Chesapeake, Virginia, do hereby proclaim March 5, 1984, the 42nd Anniversary of the formation of the Naval Construction Battalion as Seabee day in Chesapeake and urge each of our citizens to be aware of this recognition of an outstanding group of our citizens.●

● Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts, and am pleased to join my colleagues in honoring the Seabees of our Navy, both Active and Reserve, on the 42d anniversary of their founding.

We in West Virginia are pleased that we also have detachments of reserve Seabees from RNMCB-23 in the Mountaineer State, and I would join my colleague from Virginia in honoring this fine unit.

Mr. Speaker, during the dark days of World War II the finest construction men in America willingly took up arms to defend their country under the Seabee motto, "Construimus—Batuimus" which is the Latin for "We Build—We Fight."

As the Seabees paved the way to final victory they became known for a shorter motto, which was their proud boast, "Seabees Can Do." In every theater of operations the Seabees undertook construction jobs on a scale which had never been attempted before. Their attitude was that the difficult we do at once, the impossible takes a little longer.

Now, 42 years later, Seabees still "Can Do." The men of the 8 active duty construction battalions and the 17 Reserve construction battalions make up a highly trained and fully prepared naval construction force which stands ready to answer the call when they are needed.

Mr. Speaker, our Governor, John D. Rockefeller IV, proclaimed March 5, 1984, as Seabee Day in West Virginia in honor of those brave and skillful men who have served this Nation with pride. I include it in the RECORD at this point.

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas, there are certain days set aside by this great nation of ours whereby the citizens of this and other states pay homage to our Armed Forces; and,

Whereas, on these occasions marked by celebration and prayer, the dedicated men and women who have been and are serving our country in its quest for freedom for all nations are given due recognition and appreciation; and,

Now, therefore, I, John D. Rockefeller IV, Governor of the State of West Virginia, do hereby proclaim March 5, 1984 as Seabee Day in West Virginia in celebration of the 42nd anniversary of the formation of the Naval Construction Battalion.●

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I am pleased to join in honoring our Navy Seabees here today. We in New England have our own Reserve Naval Mobile Construction Battalion 12, which is headquartered in the Naval Construction Battalion Center at Davisville, RI, and which has detachments located throughout New England.

There are many citizens of Connecticut who have served in the Seabees in the past and are serving today. In their honor our Governor, William A. O'Neill, designated March 5, 1984, as Seabee Day in Connecticut, and I include that a copy of that proclamation be in the RECORD at this point:

OFFICIAL STATEMENT

The American people have a deep reverence for the cherished ideals of liberty and justice, the basic tenets upon which this nation was founded.

Many of our citizens have responded without hesitation when these ideals have been threatened by those determined to destroy our government and our way of life. The pages of our history are filled with examples of patriotic deeds by Americans of all races, creeds and national origins.

The citizens of our state and nation recognize that America remains strong and prosperous due in large measure to the commitment of those brave men and women who serve in our armed forces. One segment of our armed forces is the Navy's Construction Battalions commonly known as the Seabees.

Founded on March 5, 1942, the Seabees is a unit comprised of skilled tradespeople who, through their professionalism and knowledge of construction, contribute significantly to assuring the freedom and peace that we as Americans enjoy. These dedicated members of our armed forces, whose slogan, "Can Do", exemplifies the spirit of the Seabees, both in time of battle and in the repair and construction of new or existing facilities, have a long and proud tradition of service to our country.

Many citizens of Connecticut are members of the Navy Seabees and its Reserve Unit. Each year, they participate in an annual readiness training helping to preserve the tradition of service born during a time of great need in World War II.

Therefore, In recognition of the 42nd Anniversary of the Navy Seabees, and in tribute to the skilled professionals who are members of this excellent organization, helping to keep our country free and strong, I am proud to designate March 5, as Seabee Day in Connecticut.●

● Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, Gov. Bob Orr declared March 5, 1984, Seabee Day in Indiana in honor of the many heroic deeds and unselfish actions performed over the years by Seabees in all parts of the globe.

Today our Navy Seabees, both Active and Reserve, are an essential part of our national defense, providing a ready and highly trained construction team which can be deployed anywhere in the world with minimal notice. They have the equipment and the expertise to undertake virtually any construction job, anyplace, and at any time.

Distinguishing themselves by action in times of war and peace, Seabee teams have visited many parts of the world as ambassadors in green, using their construction skills to better the lives of those they have assisted.

Mr. Speaker, I include the text of the proclamation by Gov. Robert D. Orr setting March 5, 1984, as Seabee Day in the State of Indiana in the RECORD at this point.

Whereas, it is appropriate that the citizens of our state and nation recognize the members of the various branches of Armed Services for their unselfish actions and devotion to the duty of protecting the freedom of this great land; and

Whereas, the Navy's Construction Battalions, commonly known as the "Seabees" whose "Can Do" spirit exemplifies the caliber and attitude of its membership whether facing the challenges of battle or repairing and/or constructing existing or new facilities; and

Whereas, the Seabees, Regular and Reserve, as skilled professionals of the world of construction, are men whose multi-faceted talents afford them a place of distinction in the defense of America; and

Whereas, founded on March 5, 1942, the Navy Seabees are celebrating their 42nd Anniversary; and

Whereas, many Hoosier citizens have distinguished themselves as Navy Seabees;

Now, therefore, I, Robert D. Orr, Governor of the State of Indiana, do hereby proclaim March 5, 1984, as Seabee Day in the State of Indiana, in recognition of this distinguished Battalion of dedicated men.●

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION NECESSARY TO CURB TERRORISM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG] is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, leaders of the major economic powers of the free world gathered earlier this month in London and issued a declaration on international terrorism that I hope will be the beginning of a true international effort to counter this serious and growing problem.

Legislation I am introducing today will take the battle against terrorism one step further by urging the President to seek an international convention on terrorism at which participating countries would share intelligence about international terrorist organizations, discuss counterterrorism strategy and techniques, and adopt a convention for the suppression of international terriorism to strengthen international law with respect to terrorist threats and acts. Specifically, this convention would be charged with establishing effective procedures for dealing with international terrorism including severe punishment for acts of terrorism which endanger the lives of diplomatic staff, military personnel, other government personnel, or private citizens, and agreement on extradition of all terrorists and their accomplices to the country where the terrorist incident occurred or whose citizens were victims of the incident.

The heads of state participating in the London economic summit endorsed in general this proposal when they agreed to "promote action through competent international organizations and among the international community as a whole to prevent and punish terrorist acts." These world leaders recognize that no country is immune to the threat of terrorist attack.

The United States, however, must take the lead in preventing world terrorism because the American people are the prime targets of international terrorist attacks.

The Department of State documented 898 international terrorist incidents last year, the largest number of terrorist incidents recorded in a year since the Department began recording such statistics in 1968. Almost half of these attacks were committed against U.S. citizens, businesses, or property here or abroad.

The bloodshed and destruction from terrorist attacks further accentuates the need for an international effort to combat and control future attacks. Last year 1,288 people were wounded, 663 killed, and countless millions of dollars in property was lost or destroyed in these cowardly attacks. This toll included 274 Americans who were killed and 118 injured.

The American people cannot be lulled into a false belief that these attacks only occur outside our Nation. You need go no further than the Halls of the U.S. Capitol to see the sight of two terrorist incidents in the past year. It was last October that I stood here on the floor of the House of Representatives when the Capitol Police in the public gallery above apprehended Israel Menachem Rabinowits who was armed with plastic explosives. During his struggle with police, Mr. Rabinowits pushed the detonator to the explosives but fortunately for me and many of my colleagues the device was faulty. Demolition experts took those plastic explosives to Fort Belvoir where they were detonated. It is the opinion of those experts that had the assailant's device worked properly, the explosives were powerful enough to destroy a good part of this House Chamber and a large percentage of the Members and visitors here at the time would have been killed or seriously injured.

One month after this incident, an explosion ripped through the Senate side of the Capitol causing large amounts of destruction to the surrounding area. Fortunately the incident took place late in the evening and no one was injured.

President Reagan is to be commended for his legislative proposals that would greatly enhance our efforts to combat future acts of terrorism within the United States. His initiative would better enable Federal, State, and local law enforcement officials to investigate, infiltrate, and eliminate potential terrorist organizations and their support networks.

This legislation is essential in our efforts to prevent domestic terrorist incidents, but it only provides a partial solution to the larger problem of international terrorism. Without some type of international agreement on terrorism which provides for the extradition and prosecution of terrorists, innocent people throughout the world, including Americans here and abroad, will continue to be the targets of terrorist attack.

It was through an international effort similar to that I am calling for today, that the serious problem of skyjackings during the late 1960's and early 1970's was reduced. Concerned leaders of 77 nations met in The Hague in December 1970 and agreed on an international convention to suppress aircraft hijacking. Of the participating nations, 50 eventually ratified the agreement which obligated a nation where a hijacker was found to prosecute the hijacker "without exception whatsoever and whether or not the offence [sic] was committed in its territory." The agreement also established procedures for the extradition of hijackers to other nations for prosecution.

The results of this international convention were dramatic. Within 2 years after the United States and other nations ratified the agreement, hijackings dropped by 60 percent. Clearly this shows that nations motivated by a concern for security can meet and agree upon an international policy to lessen the threats of hijacking or terrorism. These international conventions, however, can only be successful if they are called to focus their attention on one matter of concern, putting all other differences aside.

The politically motivated United Nations, which unfortunately has had no success in its peacemaking efforts throughout the world, in 1972 established an Ad Hoc Committee on International Terrorism. The committee has met just three times in the past 12 years, and as so often is the case with the United Nations, has done little to further the cause of reducing international terrorism or even condemning those who conduct and support terrorist activities. The committee has yet to even agree on a definition of terrorism.

Despite the attitude at the United Nations, there is widespread international concern about terrorism. International terrorist networks are becoming better organized, better financed, and better equipped with more highly sophisticated weaponry and communications systems.

The growing number of State-supported terrorist incidents and the use of terrorism as a foreign policy tool has also sparked concern. The Soviet surrogate governments of Libya, Iran, Syria, North Korea, and East Germany have all been implicated recently in terrorist plots. Perhaps one of the most shocking terrorist episodes took place in May 1981 when Pope John Paul II was shot in the Vatican. A report released this month by the Italian state prosecutor details a Bulgarian terrorist network that planned, organized, financed, and carried out the attempted assassination of the Pope. Although the prosecutor's report does not directly state that the Soviet Union was involved in the Bulgarian effort, he does say, "In some secret place, where every secret is wrapped in another secret, some political figure of great power took note of this most grave situation and, mindful of the vital needs of the Eastern bloc, decided it was necessary to kill Pope Wojtyla."

There are far too many secret places in our world today where terrorists plots are being planned. The targets of these attacks will be innocent men, women, and children and half these attacks will involve Americans. Until the nations of the world adopt and implement an international agreement to suppress terrorism, this type of violence and destruction will continue because today's terrorists believe they are immune from prosecution and extradition.

Mr. Speaker, the specter of international terrorism looms throughout the world and the American people are all too often the target of attack. As the leader of the free world, our Nation must take the initiative to organize an international effort to combat the threat of terrorist attacks. The resolution I introduce today can be a major step toward eliminating the threat existing throughout the world from international terrorists.●

A NEW COALITION FOR OPEN TRADING

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. FRENZEL], is recognized for 20 minutes.

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, 2 days ago, Bill Andres, chairman of Dayton-Hudson Corp., a large, nationwide retailer, announced the formation of a new organization to defend for all Americans the benefits which flow from the world's open trading system.

The organization which Mr. Andres heads is called the Retail Industry Trade Action Coalition, or RITAC for short. The industry's obligation to present quality goods at the lowest possible prices for all U.S. consumers makes it uniquely aware of the consumer stake in world trade.

More importantly, the industry is showing a new determination to stand up for a broad, general interest against the protectionist onslaughts of those who favor a single company, a single industry, or a single trade union. The consumer interest in world trade has been playing defense since 1979. It's now time to go on offense and increase trade benefits to America.

Mr. Andres statement follows:

I'm Bill Andres, chairman of the board of the Dayton Hudson Corporation, and chairman of a newly formed organization I would like to introduce to you today—the Retail Industry Trade Action Coalition. Other members of the Coalition's Executive Committee are here with me. The total membership of the Coalition includes the CEOs of 20 retail companies and heads of eight national retail trade associations.

Together we represent a very significant segment of the American economy, the retail industry. We are:

Two million establishments, most of them small businesses;

Over 16 million employees, or 15 percent of the American work force;

Sales of more than $1 trillion, the equivalent of almost one-third of our gross national product.

Our industry is built on a single concept: We are the customer's purchasing agent. We buy goods for the American consumer. Their interests are our interests. We stand or fall together.

The success of our industry and the standard of living of our customers depend on our ability to provide the widest possible selection of the best quality merchandise at the lowest possible price. Every day, in every retail store in America, we take a "customer poll." For us, every day is election day. Our customers come in and vote. By their purchases, they tell us what they like and what they don't like. In the past decade, our customers, especially our low- and middle-income customers, have voted decisively for fashion-right, high-quality, competitively priced products—from all over the world.

That is why retailers are especially concerned about the mounting pressure to restrict imports into this country. The International Trade Commission has initiated proceedings against imported footwear, steel, copper, uranium, and even tuna. Bills have been introduced in Congress to slap new quotas on steel, automobiles, footwear and textiles. Presidential directives, in December and again in May, are making international trade in textiles and apparel more restrictive than ever before.

As retailers, we are concerned about these legislative and administrative proposals for several reasons. They threaten our ability to bring to the consumer the best possible selection of high-quality, reasonably priced merchandise. They have raised consumer prices already and threaten worse price hikes in the future. They threaten the loss of jobs, especially in those industries involved in exporting American goods abroad which are vulnerable to retaliation. Indeed, they threaten the global economic interdependence that contributes to a safer, more prosperous world. In short, import restrictions represent a hidden tax on the American consumer, which is used to provide a hidden subsidy to sustain "protected" industires.

In order to "protect" an already healthy domestic textile industry, for example, American consumers are paying billions of additional dollars for imported textiles and apparel. This hidden tax comes as a result of a complex and often arbitrary system of quotas and "calls." It is the triumph of politics over economic common sense. And we intend to do everything within our power to make the cost of that triumph very visible. Then the American consumer, and the American worker, will be able to decide whether protectionism is worth the added cost.

Tens of billions of dollars are involved. But something far more important is involved. These proposals are signals that some people believe America can no longer compete in the world market we helped build and which helped build America. They believe America must insulate herself from those who can compete.

America's retailers take another view. And we stand before you today to announce that we are not ready to stop competing. We have joined together to fight for our customers, for jobs for people who are appropriately trained, or retrained, for lower prices, and for the best possible selection, the best possible value, for the American consumer.

Those of us you see here today, and the other members of the Coalition we represent, compete with each other in the market-place every day. We intend to continue that competition because it is the very nature of our industry and because it is the foundation upon which the free enterprise system rests. Despite the fact we are competitors, we believe fervently that when our customers' interests are threatened, our entire industry is threatened. And that is why we have pledged to work together—both short and long term—toward a common goal: a more open international trading system.

In the weeks, months, and even years ahead, the Coalition will aggressively make the case to our public policy makers, and to the American people, on two fronts. We will highlight the critical role an open international trading system plays in our country's high standard of living and the high cost of protectionism to the American people—worker and consumer alike.

To begin with, we are prepared to undertake specific legal actions. Already we have filed an amicus brief joining the American Association of Exporters and Importers in appealing a ruling of the Court of International Trade. We are preparing to challenge the validity of the automatic and arbitrary "calls" of the Administration that have greatly disrupted the textile and apparel trade.

And we will be active politically to support open international trade policies, and to oppose protectionist ones. We have written to the President and met with the Secretary of Commerce. We are expanding our contacts at the White House and on Capitol Hill. And we have already begun a series of special Congressional breakfasts. We are here to say that we intend to do everything within our power to oppose protectionism, whether legislative or administrative. We will press for more open trading policies, whether through the Generalized System of Preferences, new round of negotiations in the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), or the Multifiber Agreement, due to expire in 1986.

The Coalition believes a more open international trading system is in the best interests of all segments of the American economy. It lowers prices. It helps control inflation. It raises everybody's standard of living. It stimulates the world economy, leading to more jobs, both here and abroad. It rewards efficiency, innovation and productivity. America was built on competition. Improved competitiveness is the key to future prosperity. Competitiveness has been America's edge; now it's our opportunity.●

LOWER INTEREST RATES AND ECONOMIC GROWTH BY RESTORING A GOLDEN RULE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP] is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation intended to help restore sound, honest money and low interest rates to the United States: A bill to resume the gold standard. I am pleased that my colleagues and friends, Mr. HILER of Indiana, Mrs. VUCANOVICH of Nevada, Mr. WEBER of Minnesota, Mr. MACK of Florida, Mr. GINGRICH of Georgia, Mr. DANNEMEYER of California, and Mr. WALKER OF Pennsylvania have joined me in this cause.

This measure has been a long time in coming: not only as long-overdue relief to Americans suffering economic hardship from alternately rising and falling prices and high interest rates, but even more as a matter of simple justice. Though in retrospect we can understand the circumstances, suspending convertibility of our currency into gold at the end of the 1960's has had the most far-reaching consequences of any policy mistake in a half century. It is time to correct it.

In recent years, Americans have experienced:

A tripling of prices since 1967;

Fifteen-percent mortgage rates, a 20-percent prime rate;

Almost 11-percent unemployment;

Despite a strong economic expansion over the past 18 months, a severe loss of competitiveness in industries that export or compete with imports: farms, steel, autos and their offshoots;

Calls for protectionism;

Unprecedented deficits, and a national debt that doubles every 7 years at 10 percent compound interest rates, even without new deficits;

Third World countries that can't pay their debts;

Bank panics that threaten the Nation's largest banks.

Is all this just a coincidence? Or is there some underlying problem which can explain it—and which could be corrected?

Serious inflation and economic disruption are not unprecedented. They happen during or shortly after every major war in our history. But the past 15 years have been peacetime.

Is there any similarity between wartime and the past 15 years? Yes: These are the only times when our Government suspended the gold or silver standard, with its guarantee of long-term price stability, and reverted to inconvertible paper money.

THE NATURE OF MONEY

Money does three things. It is a measure of value. It is a means of exchanging value. And it is a store of value.

The most important thing that money does is to store value. From the time money is received until the time it is spent there is always a delay; it may be a few minutes, several weeks, or many years. Debts payable in money span decades. The usefulness of money depends entirely on how well it keeps its value during those intervals.

Imagine what would happen if a yardstick were 36 inches one day, 13 inches the next, and 45 inches the day after that. Just as a yardstick cannot be a useful standard of length unless it keeps its length, money cannot be a useful standard of value unless it keeps its value.

Money stores the value of our labor until we choose to exchange that value for food, or a car, or a house. This vastly broadens our horizons in time and space. Stable money makes it possible to plan for the future, to wait for new opportunities, and to provide for a rainy day. All this is threatened when money's value becomes unstable.

Nothing is absolutely stable in value. But some goods are more stable than others. Before 1776, many things served as money in America besides coins and pieces of paper: wampum, tobacco, corn, and land, for example. Each of these was abandoned as unreliable. Since the founding of the United States, money has always been of only one of two kinds: either one of the precious metals—usually gold—or else Government-issued paper money like the Continental dollar, the Civil War greenback, or today's inconvertible Federal Reserve note. To compare their stability, we only need to look at a chart of consumer prices. It is clear that the greatest inflations in history have occurred when nations were on a paper standard, not a gold or silver standard.

WHAT DO BANKS DO?

To understand the monetary issue, you need to know the difference between money and bank credit. Money—whether it is gold or a Government greenback—is different from credit or debt, which is just an IOU: a promise to pay money. Most people understand the difference in the case of a mortgage or a personal loan. But even many economists confuse money and bank credit.

But there's an important difference: bank credit is redeemable for something else; money is not. The function of a bank is very simple. Banks accept deposits of money, and lend it out. That's all. The amount that a bank can lend out is limited by the amount of money that depositors—including borrowers from the bank—are willing to keep in the bank. A deposit or a bank note is simply a debt payable on demand in money. That's one reason why an out-of-State check is held up for a few days: to see if it is payable in money.

To repeat, banks cannot create money. They can only lend out money that would otherwise remain idle. If banks could create money, they would never get into trouble, like Penn Square or Continential Illinois: they would just create more money to pay off their debts. But banks can get into trouble when they lend too much or make bad loans, so that they cannot repay their depositors the money owed. The other side of the coin, as it were, is that, as long as bank credit is convertible into money, you don't have to worry about controlling its quantity. That's one thing wrong with trying to control M1—most of it is bank credit, not money, and should not be controlled. The problem facing us is a choice between two kinds of money: paper or gold. There's nothing wrong with the banking system.

Under the gold standard, even Federal Reserve banks could only lend money, not create it—because they could not create gold. When the Federal Reserve stopped redeeming its notes and deposits for gold, though, Federal Reserve notes stopped being promises to pay money, and became paper money itself. Today, therefore, the Federal Reserve can both create and lend money. This increased power is why we hear so much more about the Federal Reserve than we used to.

HOW ARE OUR ECONOMIC PROBLEMS RELATED TO OUR MONEY?

At the end of the Second World War, leaders of the nations of the world met in Bretton Woods, NH, to establish what became known as the Bretton Woods international monetary system. The Bretton Woods system helped make possible the price stability, the vast expansion of the world economy and trade, and the low long-term interest rates which the world enjoyed during the quarter century after the Second World War.

From the point of view of the United States, the Bretton Woods system was simply the same kind of gold standard President Roosevelt had instituted in 1934. Americans could not directly redeem gold from the Federal Reserve; but their claims on the gold could be transferred to foreigners, who could.

Under Bretton Woods, however, other currencies were redeemable for convertible dollar IOU's—U.S. bank deposits or Treasury bills—instead of gold. In effect, this based the whole free world's banking system primarily on the U.S. gold reserve, and the whole system of credit gradually became overextended.

In the late 1960's, we faced a simple choice: either to repair and improve the gold-based Bretton Woods monetary system which had proven so valuable, or else to abandon gold money for paper money. The United States suspended gold convertibility, which automatically ended the Bretton Woods system. For the first time in centuries, there was no international standard money—except insofar as other countries agreed to accept one nation's irredeemable paper money.

The effect of the breakdown of Bretton Woods on the world was roughly comparable to the disruptions which would be caused if each of the 50 States in the United States suddenly had its own currency, all floating against each other.

There was a worldwide inflation such as previously had occurred only during a world war. It was even worse in the United States because the dollar declined against most other currencies. World oil prices, which are quoted in dollars, rose even faster than inflation. The rise in rents and farm prices led to a boom in real estate and farmland. Commodity-producing countries borrowed on a vast scale from American banks, counting on repaying ever-cheaper dollars by selling their natural resources at ever-rising prices.

At first, the Federal Reserve had no consistent policy guide. Beginning in October 1979, however, the Federal Reserve moved to end the U.S. inflation by targeting various definitions of the "money" supply. Interest rates rose to unprecedented heights. The economy fell into two successive recessions, raising unemployment to almost 11 percent. Oil prices plummeted. Commodity prices fell. The real estate market went bust.

In the international scramble for liquidity, the dollar rose against other paper currencies by over 50 percent. This priced American manufactures and farm products out of the world market. Farm prices and the value of farmland fell. The imports of cars and manufactured goods increased, prompting demands for protectionism. Extensive bank loans to Third World commodity producers, to oil drillers, and to farmers—which seemed to make sense under the assumption of continued inflation—were not repayable after the prices fell, the dollar rose, and interest rates reached new heights. Penn Square bank collapsed, and later there was a run on Continental Illinois bank. Both had made extensive loans to farmers, oil producers, or manufacturers of export goods who were threatened with bankruptcy, like International Harvester. The value of questionable loans to Latin American countries by the largest American banks is over twice as large as the banks' net worth.

All of these events were triggered by the shift from the gold standard to paper money in the United States. If we are going to restore stable prices, low long-term interest rates, and reasonable financial stability, we will have to restore the gold standard.

WHAT SHOULD BE DONE?

In order to restore a modernized gold standard, it is necessary to do three things:

First, define the dollar once again as a fixed weight of gold, to stabilize its value over the long term.

Second, restore the convertibility of Federal Reserve notes and deposits into gold, to stabilize the banking system.

Third, provide for gold coinage, to restore control of the money supply to the people rather than the Government.

The bill I am introducing today does these three things.

At the same time, two other things must be done: cut Federal spending, and seek an international agreement to establish an international, not just a domestic, gold standard—one that improves even upon the Bretton Woods system.

The only difficult question is to determine the weight of gold which will define the dollar. This is sometimes loosely called "setting the price of gold." If there is any doubt about the proper dollar "price" of gold, it would be better to err on the high side. The "price" should be high enough to avoid a general fall in commodity prices and wages and to ensure an adequate supply of bank reserves. This is a technical calculation which would have to be made by the administration. As a first approximation, if the gold standard were restored today, the "price" should be no lower than today's market price—about $400—and possibly higher—perhaps $500 or more.

WHAT WOULD A MODERNIZED GOLD STANDARD ACCOMPLISH?

The gold standard is not a panacea. It would not abolish the business cycle or prevent the consequences of policy mistakes. But it would bring absolute long-term price stability and low long-term interest rates. It would help solve many of our economic problems, while reducing others to manageable proportions.

One of the first results would be a fall in interest rates, as people were convinced that there would be long-term price stability, and as the revaluation of gold provided an inflow of new bank reserves.

Without future inflation, some current speculative investments would not make sense under a gold standard. However, lower interest rates will make it possible for individuals, producers, and governments to refinance their debts at low interest rates and move into productive investments. This would benefit farmers, small businessmen, corporations, and families with mortgages and other debts. The burden of floating debt on Third World borrowers would also be eased. Lower interest rates would raise the values of financial assets and durable investments, like stocks, bonds, houses, farms, and businesses.

The stabilization of exchange rates would vastly expand world markets for American goods. It would stop the devastation of U.S. agriculture, and of the steel, copper, and auto industries. This would sharply reduce pressure for protectionism.

The U.S. Government would benefit in several ways. First, lower interest rates would reduce the cost of servicing the national debt. The current deficit would also be reduced by lowering or eliminating cost-of-living adjustments and preventing sharp rises in the cost of goods and services purchased by the Government. Since the Tax Code is largely indexed for inflation starting in 1985, there would be little negative impact on revenues from reduced inflation. There would be a positive effect as economic growth was increased by lower inflation.

In short, if we want to realize full employment without inflation, return interest rates to their low historical levels, and balance the Federal budget, we must institute a modernized gold standard. I urge any colleagues to join me in doing so.

Mr. Speaker, today's Wall Street Journal contains an excellent article by my friend Lew Lehrman on why we must restore a modernized gold standard. I commend this fine article to my colleagues.

The article follows:

GOLDEN ANTIDOTE TO HIGH INTEREST

(By Lewis E. Lehrman)

The threat of inflation and punitive interest rates is the transcendent economic issue of our times. This financial disorder is to our generation what depression and the tragedy of unemployment were to our parents and grandparents. Searching the 200-year history of the Industrial Revolution to find a full decade of average interest rates as high as those during the period of 1974 to 1984, it is necessary to go back to the French Revolution and the total financial collapse of France in the years 1789 to 1799. The modern history of interest rates shows that in periods such as ours there has been only one way to return to relatively low, long-term interest rates, and that is by a monetary order based on a gold-backed currency.

For example, the period of the American Revolution was a time of paper-money hyperinflation, immense budget deficits and high interest rates (for example, 26% to 40% on long-term government bonds in 1787). As a result of this experience, the founders in 1789 established the new constitutional republic upon the bedrock of a currency and credit reform—largely the initiative of Alexander Hamilton. Through the Coinage Act of 1792 he refinanced the public debt and established a convertible dollar, based on a gold-and-silver standard. As a result, low fixed interest rates of 6½% to 7½% for long-term government bonds became commonplace. After the monetary reform, between 1792 and 1801, budget deficits were actually exceeded by the budget surpluses. A decade of economic boom without inflation followed domestic monetary reform.

RESTORATION OF GOLD FRANC

By means of a very similar monetary reform—restoration of the gold franc—Napoleon ended the French revolutionary period of inflation, floating exchange rates and high interest rates (average yields of 34% in 1799 on government bonds). These high interst rates, like our own, had been brought about by government-manipulated "assignats," the inconvertible paper-money issues of the French revolutionary government. The return to gold convertibility brought down interest rates to 6% (or lower) on government bonds from 1806—with a few years's exceptions—until World War I.

As recently as 1959, after two decades of a flexible franc and comparatively high interest rates, French President Charles DeGaulle and Prof. Jacques Rueff reformed the domestic monetary system and lauched the Fifth Republic on a decade of economic growth, exceeding even Germany's growth. The Rueff reforms restored a franc convertible to gold, ended France's inflation, lowered interest rates, led to a balanced budget and linked the gold franc to the Bretton Woods system of fixed exchange rates.

A century and a half earlier in Britain, the 1819–1821 restoration of the gold standard had ended an era of comparatively high interest rates, floating exchange rates and parliamentary paper-money experiments. These experiments also had begun during the Anglo-Napoleonic wars—a 24-year financial nightmare (1795–1891) of alternating wartime inflation and peacetime austerity and deflation. For example, British long-term government bonds yielded 3% to 4.5% from 1735 to 1785. From 1795, when pound convertibility was suspended, yields almost doubled, peaking at nearly 7% in 1798. But in expectation of the return to gold convertibility of the paper pound in 1819, yields declined almost 50%, and continued to decline thereafter. The capital markets of London revived, undergirded by sterling convertibility to gold, and offered interset rates of 2% to 4% for British government bonds for almost a century.

In 1879, the U.S. officially ended a 17-year epoch of inconvertibility and financial disorder. The Civil War and Reconstruction period, with its paper money ("greenbacks") and floating exchange rates, was also marked by comparatively high interest rates. For example, the average yield on long-term govenment bonds during the 1850s was 4.33%. In the first year after the suspension of dollar convertibility in 1861-62, yields ran about 50% higher, to average about 6.5%. Peak rates also occurred in 1861-1862—6.75% as measured in greenback yields, higher if measured in gold prices.

During Reconstruction, in expectation of the return of gold convertibility in 1879, market yields on long-term government bonds declined to 3.75%, to 40% decline from the peak in 1861-1862. During the decade after dollar convertibility was restored (1879-1889), average yields declined radically to 2.13% in 1889, averaging 2.71% for the entire decade. The U.S. monetary reform of 1879 has reestablished a necessary condition of low interest rates—the gold dollar—and linked it to the international monetary order of the day, a general system of multinational currency convertibility and free trade, upheld at the center by the convertible, gold-backed British pound.

Why do free convertible currencies and an international monetary order, based on the gold standard, produce such positive financial effects? Because only a fixed value for any unit of measurement can bestow reliability and trust on the chosen standard. Faith in a just and lasting value for an objective standard of economic measurement and exchange, namely money, is crucial for commerce. Confidence in the fixed value of the monetary standard, the measuring rod of economic value, is similar to our enduring trust in the fixed value for the principal measure of length, the yardstick—always 36 inches. Who would arbitarily depreciate the value of the yardstick to 30 inches tomorrow or gradually augment its value to 40 inches one year from now?

That is precisely the arbitrary power we give today to the Federal Reserve—to depreciate and appreciate the value of the monetary yardstick, the dollar. That's because there is no longer any legal requirement to maintain the value of the monetary standard—that is, a stable dollar, a convertible currency. And because of universal floating exchange rates, the Fed is in fact free, through open-market operations to increase or decrease the supply of credit and money without limit. The financial markets are fully aware of this fact, remained as they are by the open-market operations of the New York Fed at 11:45 a.m. almost every day. Indeed, total Federal Reserve financial-market purchases and sales of government securities have reached $2 trillion in a single year. Imagine the destabilizing effect of $2 trillion of government purchases and sales in the market for any other product.

By means of open-market operations, the Fed creates and destroys bank money without creating or removing new goods and services during the same market period. Thus, on the one hand, too expansive open-market purchases of government securities by the Fed cause demand to exceed supply at prevailing prices and inflation gets under way, as happened between 1977 and 1980. Or, on the other hand, open-market sales of government securities by the Fed often reduce credit too abruptly and cause demand to fall short to supply, and a drift toward deflation gets underway. This happened in the fourth quarter of 1981 and more recently in the third week of this past May when, just after the collapse of Continental Illinois, the Fed sold $4.1 billion of government securities, leading to the largest ever weekly drop in Federal Reserve credit. Uncertainty about such Fed operations has raised the risk premium in interest rates.

Only a fixed monetary standard can abolish this risk premium in long-term interest rates and renew faith in the fixed value of all future money payments on borrowings (bonds, mortgages, stocks and other long-term financial contracts). Confidence in the stable future purchasing power of a convertible dollar leads directly to a boom in the supply of savings offered for long periods at fixed, low rates. This new supply of savings will tend to lower the price of credit, i.e. interest rates. Only a real currency, legally convertible to gold at a fixed rate, can bring about these effects in the capital markets. That is why the Constitution of our country—originating as it did in 1789 after a catastrophic inflation of the previous currency of the Continental Congress ("not worth a Continental")—upholds a gold- or silver-backed currency.

In this general understanding, a comprehensive economic reform, containing the solutions to the related problems of inflation, the budget deficit, high interest rates and the hidden threat of deflation follows directly from the analysis:

(1) Reduce as rapidly and humanely as possible the federal budget deficit. But the president cannot currently control the deficit without using an indiscriminate, broad-brush veto of multibillion-dollar appropriations bills. The president needs the line-item veto he has requested and the legal forces of a constitutional amendment in order to require Congress to balance the budget annually in the future.

(2) The economic-reform program also should include a renovation of the federal tax structure—a low, simple, fair flat tax. This would create compelliing incentives for more work, saving, investment, new jobs and the production of new goods, and therefore tend to balance supply-and-demand conditions in the market through economic growth, without creating disincentives by raising tax rates. In truth, an authentic demand for a balanced budget and low interest rates can only mean a demand for raising tax revenues through rapid economic growth without inflation.

NEW MONETARY PHILOSOPHY NEEDED

(3) At the same time, the Fed must abandon its failed quantitative monetary targeting. A new Federal Reserve monetry philosophy must be adopted—one that will supply, at market rates, the new money and credit currently needed by small enterprises, farms and entrepreneurs for the profitable production of new goods and services. So long as new money is borrowed at market rates to create new goods and services, there can be no inflation. If the ratio of new goods to new credit stays approximately in balance over the long term, it does not matter how much new credit and money is created.

(4) This new target should be part of a domestic and international monetary reform designed to restore a gold-backed dollar.

We know that sustained economic growth and full employment require a long-term investment boom and the rebuilding of a competitive American economy. And that a long-term investment boom requires the means to finance it. To restore ample long-term bond markets at low, fixed interest rates, we must ensure the value of all future money payments to those willing to lend their savings for the long term. This means by every careful study of history, a true and reliable monetary standard, and only a gold or silver backed currency has been the honest money of history.●

THE HEALTH EFFECTS OF RADIATION RESEARCH ACT OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. WIRTH] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this century, the Government has recognized that one of its most important functions is ensuring the safety of our Nation's workers. Substantial progress has been made since the days of Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle" in providing a safer and healthier work environment. No longer are manufacturing plants dens of torture. No longer do we turn our backs on the black lung and brown lung plight facing our miners. Our Nation can be proud of the progress that has been made in providing a healthy working environment, although further efforts are necessary in many industries.

The nuclear industry, however, faces a different situation. There are 83,000 men and women employed in nuclear facilities across the country who are exposed to heavy amounts of radiation every day. Since the early tests of nuclear weapons at Los Alamos and in Utah, there has been disagreement and controversy over the health hazards posed by heavy radiation exposure. Because of this uncertainty, efforts have been made to ensure the safety of workers through regulations and safety precautions. At the same time, research has been encouraged to determine the magnitude of the health hazards facing workers. It is imperative that this research be done in the most objective and unbiased manner possible. Yet, the Federal agency performing the bulk of this research is the same agency which has responsibility for operating and promoting nuclear facilities: the Department of Energy. This is akin to allowing the plant manager in the meatpacking plant in "The Jungle" to determine what is safest for the plant's workers.

The Department of Energy is currently responsible for approximately 60 percent of the Federal research into the health affects of radiation. At the same time, this agency operates and maintains our nuclear production facilities. This conflict of interest casts doubts on the objectivity of their research and on their interest in worker safety and health.

Research into the health effects of radiation must be continued. We must not relent in the search for answers. However, it is critical that this research be conducted objectively, in a manner in which workers and the public can place the highest confidence. The quality of the research conducted by the Department of Energy and the validity of its conclusions is not at issue. Instead, the issue is whether the workers and the industry can have confidence in the work. No Federal agency which manages the facilities it studies can meet this concern.

For this reason, I am introducing legislation to transfer the authority for these studies from the Department of Energy to the Department of Health and Human Services [HHS]. There are several reasons why HHS makes a better choice. Intuitively, it makes more sense to have responsibility for a health issue rest with an agency with responsibility for health issues, not one with responsibility for operating energy and defense programs. Moreover, under HHS's jurisdiction comes the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health [NIOSH], the agency mandated to protect and safeguard the health of America's workers. Finally, HHS and several other agencies within the Department have studied the health effects of radiation extensively. These include the National Cancer Institute, the Bureau of Radiological Health in the Food and Drug Administration, the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, and the Centers for Disease Control. The Secretary of HHS, under this legislation, would consult with the heads of all these agencies in conducting the research. Furthermore, an advisory panel would be established to provide advice and assistance in conducting this research.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is long overdue. There have been numerous attempts in recent years to shift research responsibility from DOE to public health agencies, but we always seem to end up where we started, with DOE performing most of the work and public health agencies performing very little. Task forces and advisory panels have been created, but they are short lived. Congress must enact legislation specifically mandating the transfer of this function. It is my hope that it will not take disaster like one which occurred at the Sunshine silver mine disaster before this action is taken. Prior to this tragedy, responsibility for miners' health and safety lay with the Department of the Interior, the same agency interested in promoting coal production. Only after more than 90 people were killed did Congress realize that you can't have both worker safety and production under the same leadership and transferred mine safety and health out of the Department of the Interior. Let us know before a similar disaster occurs in the nuclear industry.●

CONDEMNATION OF REMARKS OF LOUIS FARRAKHAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, the recent statements made by Louis Farrakhan regarding Israel and the Jewish religion must be condemned. Blacks and Jews have been allies, not adversaries, in the struggle to bring all Americans together and strengthen this country's democratic ideals of equality and justice for all.

Recently, there has been deep concern in both the black and Jewish communities that this alliance was faltering. Opinions such as those Farrakhan espouses only serve to shake that hard-fought alliance.

Racial and religious hatred and bigotry must be condemned whatever the source and regardless of who the purveyor or purveyors may be. I urge all decent and tolerant Americans who deplore bigotry, racism, and discrimination to join me in this unqualified condemnation of the remarks made Sunday by Mr. Farrakhan.●

PROPOSAL OF INDEPENDENT CORPORATION TO BUY AND SELL PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN], is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I am today joined by a number of fellow Members in the introduction of a bill to stabilize oil prices by creating an independent corporation to buy and sell crude and petroleum products.

In introducing this measure, I do so against the background of this past winter's home heating oil shortage, price gyrations, and the almost disastrous series of inaccurate supply-demand estimates for home heating oil made by the industry. I believe the time has come for us in Congress to move toward solving home heating oil supply problems that threaten to become recurrent.

This bill proposes to establish an uncomplicated approach to the problem of guaranteeing a stable, uninterruptible supply of low-cost fuel to hardship areas and people in need. The bill proposes the creation of an Oil Trading Corporation [OTC], and directs the Corporation to buy, hold, and sell crude oil and refined products in order to reduce the potential for supply disruptions and rapid price increases.

The Corporation would be directed by a nine member Board, five to be appointed by the President for 3-year terms, and four to be selected by OTC stockholders. The Board would decide on how much oil should be sold by the Corporation as well as when it should be sold, in order to maximize the stabilization of market forces during times of oil shortages; $100 million would be authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1985, with which to buy class A stock in the OTC. I believe that this initial equity investment would be sufficient for the Corporation to purchase about 3 million barrels of crude oil. Class B stock in the OTC could be purchased by any U.S. person, and oil owned by the Corporation could be sold during a shortage only to U.S. persons.

The proposed OTC presents some important potential benefits:

First, it could provide a supply cushion to minimize shortages and price increases;

Second, the OTC could store refined products such as home heating oil;

Third, the OTC could store such products in existing tanks in different regions around the country;

Finally, by buying low in times of surplus, and selling at a higher price, when markets tighten up, it could operate at a profit, yet sell from its stockpiles at less than the going market sales price should demand for heating oil exceed available supply.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the purposes sought through this proposed legislation are a most worthy addition to the important field of national energy policy. I urge my fellow Members to join in this effort to strike at the heart of a problem plaguing far too many of our citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I ask consent that the bill and supporting material be made a part of the RECORD immediately following these remarks.

THE HINGE OF FATE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, the late Winston Churchill had a remarkable way of expressing the momentous times in which he lived; one of his books was titled, "The Hinge of Fate." In economic terms at least, that is what we are living in today—the times when the hinge of fate is moving. Sad to say, the hinge is moving against whatever hopes we might have for a return to low unemployment, low interest rates, and steady growth. What we have now is an economy that is very good for a very few, very bad for a great many, and barely tolerable for the great majority. It is also an economy endangered by the precarious condition of the banking system, the indifferent blindness of the administration, and the growing threat that foreign debtors cannot repay their hundreds of billions of dollars worth of loans to U.S. banks.

The administration likes to tell us how the rate of inflation is down, but that does not mean that life is easier for most Americans. Indeed, just this last weekend I was stopped in the grocery store by a young constituent who told me how he is working two jobs, how he shops carefully, and how he struggles, but still finds himself unable to meet the inexorably rising costs of higher local taxes, higher utility bills, higher food costs, and higher transportation costs. And I meet more and more people who are angry and frustrated that no matter how hard they try, there is no way to keep ahead of the rising costs of the simple, daily necessities of life.

A look at a few statistics will tell you that these people are not lying; for the vast majority of Americans, real, disposable income has increased by less than $300 a year since 1980. That's an increase in so-called disposable income of less than $10 a month. And what is disposable income? That's what you can use to go to the movies with, or do something a little extra. It's what you hope to save, so that someday you can hope to afford a house. But the possibilities just aren't there, when real income is not growing at any appreciable rate, a rate less than the overall rate of inflation. One reflection of just how hard things are is the rate of savings. Those of us who remember the 1981 tax bonanza, the great giveaway to the rich and to the special interests, were told how savings would boom. Well, the rate of savings today is lower than any time in the past 15 years. Why? It's simple: People just don't have any money to save. There isn't anything left over after paying for the daily necessities of life—and for millions, there is no way to even pay for those basic necessities.

And why not? Look at just some of the components of the cost of living. The cost of rental housing has gone up 20 percent in the past year and a half. This is a time when inflation is said to be cooling. Sure it is—but not if you pay rent. The cost of food is up by 20 percent in the past year and a half. This at a time when inflation is supposed to be on the decline. It may be, but not if you have to shop for food. Fuel and utility costs are up 30 percent in the past year and a half. Inflation may be cooling—but not if you have to heat or cool a house, or buy fuel to get to work. Medical care has increased most of all—50 percentage points in the past year and a half. The victims of inflation hear about all the good news, but they see it less and less possible to live from one paycheck to the next—and in fact it is less possible. The illusion of good news does not translate into food on the table or clothing on the back. It does not cost less to live day by day—it costs more. And the hard reality is, incomes are not rising as fast as the cost of living. That is why I see angry young people in the grocery store; that is why the economic data show more and more people forced into part-time work, or two jobs. That is why people cannot save. That is why there is a years-long waiting list for subsidized housing of any kind—because that is the only affordable housing there is.

Look at wage rates, and you will see how hardships are growing in this country. Between 1979 and 1982 the earnings index shrank by no less than 8 percent. Today the typical paycheck is worth several dollars less than it was in 1975. Is that progress? No, it's moving backward. But what about all this prosperity we've been hearing about? You can't see it in the earnings index, which has actually declined this year. Working people are not better off—they are worse off. If this is the new prosperity, there are precious few who can afford much more of it.

Look at unemployment, and you can see how we have come to tolerate the intolerable. It is true that we have more people working this year than last—but the number working today is the same as it was in 1981. The economy, as far as jobs go, has come back—but only back to where it was 3 years ago. And I repeat, earnings on a real basis have not come back—they are less today than they were 10 years ago. The rate of unemployment for adult males today is 50 percent higher than it was in 1978. Sure, it is less now than it was 1 year ago—but intolerably high by any historical measure. Overall, the rate of unemployment for men and women today is 25 percent higher than it was in 1979. For black workers, unemployment is 25 percent higher than it was 5 years ago. No matter what category of worker you look at, the prospects of finding a job today are vastly worse than they were 4 or 5 or 10 years ago. Is this prosperity? No, it is growing desperation. Sure, you can argue that things are marginally better—but better for whom? Not for those who are looking for work without success, not for those for whom there are few jobs and fewer choices, not for those who are trying to make ends meet with a shrinking real income.

We've heard for months about how interest rates were going down. But have you looked lately? Interest rates have gone up, not down. And when they went down, they never went down to anything resembling historical levels. Municipal bonds, for instance, pay twice the interest today that they did 6 years ago, and far more than they did in the years before that. Indeed, municipal bond interest costs are the same now as they were 3 years ago. Does that reflect improvement? No, it reflects uncertainty over the future. No one is willing to bet on what will happen next. Treasury paper today is selling at close to 14 percent. Home mortgages for almost 15 percent. Consumer interest is anywhere between 18 and 22 percent, depending on how greedy the local credit card folks are. Corporate interest rates are twice what they were a decade ago. And we are told that interest rates are just fine. Just fine for whom? Last weeks's blip in the prime interest rate will cost the Treasury $1 billion a month in added financing costs. It will place burdens that are likely to be intolerable on foreign debtors who already are unable to pay their loans off.

Higher interest cost will inevitably translate into lost jobs—how many and how soon depends on how fast and how far the rates increase. They will translate into more bankruptcies—and the bankruptcy rate is running as high today as it was before today's so-called prosperity came back. They will translate into more home foreclosures, less home building, and fewer home sales, as mortgage rates become even more intolerable than they are today.

Yes, there is prosperity for a few. There is prosperity for those who enjoy high income. There is plenty for those who raid the corporate securities market, or practice the high arts of greenmail, or who have friends in high places. But for most of our fellow citizens, these are not good times—they are tough times, and getting tougher. There may be less desperation today, less fear—but there is no less uncertainty, no less anger, no less frustration. People see that the Tax Code favors the rich. They see that the banks have been merciless in their interest demands and irresponsible in their lending practices, and they see the monster banks enjoying multibillion dollar bailouts, while the local business goes down the tubes.

People see that the cost of anything they need or use or must have is not only beyond reason, but that the cost of every necessity continues to rise at terrifying rates. And our people wonder what we are doing about it. So what are we doing?

We enact a tax and budget cut bill that places almost the whole burden of the cuts on the Nation's poorest segment—its elderly who are on fixed incomes and unable to absorb the higher costs that we are telling them to shoulder. We enact a tax bill that grants $1 billion break to the insurance industry, while loading another nickle a gallon diesel fuel tax on truckers, who are suffering through the most harrowing of times already. We tell the high-income folks that they cannot write off an automobile that costs more than twenty grand, and we tell the average taxpayer that, by the way, income averaging will just be a forlorn hope, in case you happen to have a good year next year.

We make what is unfair even less fair, in the name of fiscal sanity.

In these past 3 years we have lived with policies that induced and made worse hard times, the worst times in 50 years. We have seen policies that bring us back to where we started, and we call that prosperity. Now we see policies that threaten to plunge the country into the hole again, and we call that a sign that things are going to get better, soon. And what do we offer by way of some hope for prosperity and stability? The old-time religion that got us into the mess, or a pale imitation of it. We must think that people love to be hurt, because our policies these past few years have created hurt and harm and lost hopes beyond all imagining or measurement.

It's little wonder that angry people ask me what is wrong and what they can do about it. Little wonder, because they can see and feel that this is an economy that is very good—but only for a very few. For the vast majority, it is very bad and getting worse, because the possibility of survival becomes tougher each day, and the hope of actually getting ahead is just not there. Is that good times? Is that the country that we want? I don't think so. It is not the world I dreamed of, not the world I have worked for, not the world that I believe is possible. Neither is this the kind of world that our fellow citizens believe in. They know we can do better than this. They wait only for leadership. But they are getting only platitudes from the White House, confusion from the Congress, and a hollow echo from those who are supposed to be offering alternatives. No wonder there is anger. There is reason for it, and we should be amazed by the patience that our people have shown. But we should not make the mistake of supposing that patience will last forever, let alone suppose that it stands for agreement with existing policy. Our people are waiting for a vision that is worthy of their belief, worthy of their great energy, worthy of their country. The hinge of fate is turning. The question is, Can we turn it toward a better tomorrow, or have we learned nothing?●

DOUBLE STANDARDS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, in my years as a Member of this body I have come to accept irony as part of the natural course of business. Nonetheless, I find the visit by Salvadoran political figure Roberto D'Aubuisson—reputed death-squad leader—a most cruel twist of logic.

I am not advocating a blanket ban on visas requested by foreign political leaders whose views we may find objectionable. That would not be in keeping with this Nation's historic commitment to freedom of speech. I firmly believe, however, that in the interest of fairness the same standards ought to apply to all persons seeking to visit the United States.

The case of Mr. D'Aubuisson underscores the double standards with which this administration has played politics with visa requests. While Secretary of State George Shultz was denouncing terrorists and terrorism and while U.S. officials were linking D'Aubuisson to an assassination effort of the present U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador, the same Department of State overturns an earlier ruling by granting Mr. D'Aubuisson a visa. Not only does this fly in the face of their denunciations of terrorists, but it contradicts their actions in denying the visa requests of several ranking Nicaraguan officials.

A State Department spokesman, in explaining the recent reversal, offered that Mr. D'Aubuisson was granted the visa because he holds a key role in Salvadoran politics and the United States is much interested in the evolution of that process. Surely this same standard could be applied to Sandinista leaders denied entry into this country.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. D'Aubuisson has been accorded the finest treatment during his visit to this country. He was the featured guest at a special session with Members of the Senate. He had the privilege of a private meeting with Assistant Secretary of State Langhorne A. Motley. In fact, little pomp has been spared—all this despite recent intelligence information linking Mr. D'Aubuisson to the death squads and to the assassination plot of U.S. Ambassador Thomas R. Pickering.

Our democratic system of Government has historically recognized the importance of opposing opinions in the political process. Just as we need not endorse the views of Mr. D'Aubuisson, we need not endorse the policies of the Nicaraguan Government to allow its representatives to visit the United States. But at a very minimum, we must be evenhanded in deciding who will or will not be allowed to enter and, in particular, who will be greeted with a red carpet.●

EXPLANATION BY MR. FUQUA OF THE COMPROMISE AMENDMENT TO H.R. 5155

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FUQUA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr Speaker, most of the provisions contained in the compromise amendment are drawn from H.R. 5155 either as originally passed by the House or as amended by the Senate; the intent of such provisions is clearly explained in House Report 98-647 or Senate Report 98-458. However, in a number of instances, the language in the compromise amendment does differ from that contained in either the House- or Senate-passed bills. The following paragraphs describe these cases where new language appears in the compromise amendment in order to explain congressional intent with respect to commercialization of civil remote-sensing space systems.

Section 104(4). "Unenhanced data" has been redefined to make it clear that such data need not include even the minimal processing described in the House-passed definition.

Section 201(a)(2). "Agreements" rather than "Memoranda of Understanding" is used, as in section 205, to describe arrangement for data exchange between the U.S. Government and foreign ground stations. "Agreements" is a broader term than "Memoranda of Understanding," but clearly includes the latter. The broader term is used in order to include all such relevant arrangements whether or not they are called memoranda of understanding.

Sections 202(a) and 303(a)(1). In both title II and title III, the House and Senate have agreed expressly to authorize the contracting procedures contained therein because of the unusual, even unique, nature of this phased transfer of an operation from Government to private-sector responsibility. Thus, the Congress intends these provisions to take precedence over and to supplement other general procurement law.

Section 202(a)(2). Language regarding the title II contract has been changed to indicate that under such contract, funds could flow either from the Government to the contractor—if the contractor operated the Landsat system in addition to marketing Landsat data—or from the contractor to the Government—if the contractor only marketed Landsat data.

Section 202(c) and 303(c). Senate language on notification of the Congress regarding the title II and title III contracts has been altered slightly. The report-and-wait period has been shortened from 30 days of continuous session of Congress to 30 calendar days, in recognition of the delays which could be imposed on the commercialization process by a requirement to wait for 30 days of continuous session of Congress.

Section 301(b). The original House definition of "MSS data" has been replaced by a definition of "data continuity." Under the new definition, it is clear that the title III contractor is required to meet minimum performance standards, including provision of unenhanced data that meet compatibility and functionally equivalent standards. The contractor is not required to develop any particular type or level of technology.

Section 303(a)(2). This new subsection makes it clear that the title III contractor must acquire a license under title IV.

Section 303(d). If the Secretary receives no acceptable proposal under title III, it is the clear intent of the Congress that the Secretary should assure data continuity by developing a land remote-sensing space system to be procured and operated by the Federal Government.

Section 304(a)(6). Support of the title III contractor by the Federal Government has been limited to loans, loan guarantees, or direct subsidies by removal of language in the Senate amendment which referred to "other financial considerations."

Section 401(a)(2). This new subsection indicates that the licensing authority of the Secretary, in the case of multiple-use space systems, extends only to the remote-sensing portions of such systems.

Sections 401(d) and 403(a). The Secretary may deny or condition a license on the basis of national security, international commitments and obligations, or noncompliance with nondiscriminatory access, but not in order to limit competition.

Section 402(b)(6). The original Senate amendment stipulated that the licensee obtain advance approval from the Secretary of any agreement with a foreign entity. In an attempt to balance considerations of commercial viability with the sensitivities involved in international remote sensing, this language has been changed to require only notification of the Secretary of such agreements.

Sections 402(b)(7) and 403(a)(2). The Secretary is authorized to inspect the licensee's equipment, facilities, or financial records. It is intended that the Secretary's authority to inspect financial records be adequate to ensure that the licensee is in compliance with provisions of the act relating to nondiscriminatory access to unenhanced data.

Section 403(a)(6). In light of the international sensitivities involved in remote sensing and the transportability of remote-sensing hardware, the Secretary is given authority for seizure of objects, records, or reports. However, the standard for seizure has been tightened from the House-passed reasonable appearance to the more stringent probable cause.

Section 405(e). Section 405(e) states that nothing in title IV affects the authority of the Federal Communications Commission pursuant to the Communications Act of 1934, as amended.

Section 501(c). Section 501(b) of the Senate amendment has been divided into section 501(b) and section 501(c) to highlight the differing, but complementary, roles in research and development of the Secretary, which appear in section 501(b), and the Secretaries of Agriculture and Interior, which appear in section 501(c).

Sections 601(a) and 104(3). Section 601(a) has changed little during legislative action on H.R. 5155. It is noted here only to emphasize the clear congressional intent that any system operator make unenhanced data available on a nondiscriminatory basis. Thus, for example, a company could not be licensed to operate, and to retain exclusive use of data from, a private remote-sensing space system in its entirety.

Section 602(d). This section has been redrafted to clarify that the Secretary may not demand data from a system operator for archival purposes unless the Secretary has available appropriated funds to pay such system operator for the costs of reproducing and transmitting the data.

Section 603. A system operator may provide that data not be reproduced or disseminated by any purchaser. However, during the life of existing memoranda of understanding, this provision is not intended to abrogate the authority of foreign ground-station operators with respect to the dissemination of land remote-sensing data.

Section 606. The Senate amendment has been altered to clarify the authority of the Federal Communications Commission to license use of radio facilities by private remote-sensing space systems after the President has made available spectrum for use by such systems.

Section 607(c). This subsection has been redrafted to clarify that reimbursements may cover only costs associated with technical changes in system performance imposed in light of national security concerns. Reimbursement would not cover costs ordinarily associated with the economic and political risks of doing business abroad. Thus, a system operator would not be reimbursed if he were temporarily forbidden to conduct business in a given country. Reimbursements apply only to private-sector parties who have obtained a license pursuant to title IV.

Section 609. An authorization of $75 million is provided for fiscal year 1985, which will be expended largely for development of the land remote-sensing system pursuant to title III. It is expected that the Secretary will submit a supplemental budget request to the Congress during fiscal year 1985 for the financial support authorized under title III, and the level of funding under this section would enable the Secretary to proceed without delay. Any authorization under this section remaining after fiscal year 1985 may be expended by the Secretary in future fiscal years.●

A COMMONSENSE STRATEGY TO KEEP AMERICA STRONG

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PENNY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, shortly after we return from our Independence Day recess, the House is expected to begin debate on the defense appropriations bill for fiscal year 1985. We must adopt a commonsense strategy governed by current budget limitations and wise choices of weapon systems that enhance America's national security.

We in Congress must resist weapons systems which are unnecessary or too costly. We can maintain a strong national defense while avoiding expenditures that are destabilizing, wasteful, or duplicative. In the area of defense spending as in any spending category, more is not necessarily better; only better is better. And we can do better while spending less on the military than we are now planning to spend.

Defense is now the fastest growing function in the Federal budget. It has nearly doubled in the past 4 years. In 1980, our military budget totaled $146 billion—24 percent of the budget. Today, this budget is almost twice as large at $264 billion in budget authority and the administration originally requested for next year another $50 billion—or 18 percent—increase. Most of the growth in this budget has been for the development and purchase of new nuclear and other weapon system. This front loading of procurement of big ticket items leads to further strains on our budget. Worse yet is that fact that we have been buying these major weapons systems on credit. The bill to pay for them will come due in future generations.

When it comes to matters of defense spending, Congress must choose what we need and what we can afford. While fighting the problems of a huge Federal deficit, all areas of spending must be carefully evaluated. This past April, the House passed a budget resolution that established a level of 8.2 percent—3.5 percent real—growth in defense spending for fiscal year 1985. At the very least, we should stay within this limit. Careful planning is required to stay within the budget and to ensure that we do not mortgage the future by borrowing heavily to pay for defense spending today.

COMMONSENSE OPTIONS

Various individuals and groups have issued statements and reports describing how the defense budget can be better structured and directed.

In a recent study by the Brookings Institution, "Economic Choices 1984," William W. Kaufman, consultant to the Foreign Policy Studies Program and a member of the faculty of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, states that the United States could reduce military costs significantly without weakening the Nation's defense or even altering our basic strategy. He argues persuasively that we could reach the Reagan administration's defense objectives more efficiently by eliminating duplicative weapon systems, moderating the pace of modernization, and abandoning certain questionable programs. In all, these choices would result in a savings of $175 billion during fiscal years 1985–89. Of that, he estimates $23.5 billion could be saved in fiscal year 1985.

Business Week recently conducted a thorough study of budget options and has recommended (a) the elimination of several big ticket items—MX, B–1B, DDG–51 destroyers, the Bradley Fighting Vehicle, and the DIVAD air defense system, (b) that procurement be open to more competition and (c) that a number of research projects be slowed or canceled. These suggestions would result in a $30 billion budget saving in fiscal year 1989 alone, and at least $90 billion in savings over the 5-year period 1985–89.

Senator CHARLES GRASSLEY, Republican from Iowa, has suggested that we freeze the defense budget—in addition to freezing all other Federal spending programs—in fiscal year 1985 in order to force the Pentagon to adopt more realistic defense strategies and purchasing practices and to avoid the possibility of block obsolescence of weapon systems 20 years from now. His proposal is very similar to the across-the-board budget freeze which many of us in the House—both Democrats and Republicans—supported earlier this year.

The Grace Commission has issued a set of recommendations to trim the defense budget primarily by improving management and procurement.

Such efforts point out that there is broad-based concern about our current defense spending pattern. These proposals cannot be characterized as defense cuts because in no instance do they recommend spending less on defense—only that we slow the rate of increase. I have voted for budget resolutions which would have allowed for a reasonable rate of growth in defense spending—between 5 percent and 8.2 percent per year. However, I have not voted for defense authorizations or appropriations bills because they have locked us into spending increases greater than these amounts which is, frankly, more than we can afford. Commonsense tells us that in a military budget this large—$264 billion—we can maintain a strong defense while slowing the rate of military spending increases in the future. Following the lead of these groups and individuals, we in Congress must adopt commonsense defense priorities by making choices that are prudent, affordable and contribute to the effectiveness of our national security capabilities.

A CLOSER LOOK AT BIG TICKET ITEMS

Today, we are not choosing military systems based on what we need or how much we can afford to spend. We are buying virtually every weapon system on the Pentagon wish list—at too fast a pace.

America's strategic nuclear forces must maintain our deterrent strength in order to thwart any effort by an enemy to exploit the advantage of a nuclear attack. At present the United States has such a force, a combination of long-range bombers as well as land- and submarine-based missiles. It is essential to modernize these strategic forces as weapons age and Soviet capability improves.

However, both the Business Week and Brookings Institute studies point to duplication in our military budget. Where is the duplication? First, the Air Force is proceeding with five different ways to penetrate Soviet air defense by bomber or bomber type systems. It is upgrading the B-52 bomber force as well as producing two types of air-launched cruise missiles. In addition, the Air Force is pursuing the rapid acquisition of the B-1B bomber and continuing a large-scale program for the early production of an advanced technology Stealth bomber.

Without impairing the United States' ability to penetrate Soviet air defenses, cancellation of the B-1B would save a total of $15.5 billion. The United States could improve its existing bomber force by further upgrading and thus retaining more B-52's. The bombers could be converted to carry more air-launched cruise missiles. This would free savings and help ensure that funds are available to procure and deploy the advanced technology Stealth bomber, if needed.

Second, our strategic missile force plans are also redundant. The Navy and Air Force are proceeding with two costly ballistic missiles—the MX missile system and the submarine-based Trident D-5. In addition, development of the Midgetman missile is planned. When the upgraded Minuteman III missile is added to the list, the Pentagon is planning a nuclear arsenal of four hard target weapons.

The MX missile contributes relatively little to U.S. retaliatory capabilities. According to a congressional budget report, 100 MX missiles in Minuteman silos would contribute 3 percent in 1990 and less than 1 percent in 1996 of all U.S. hard target warheads that would be expected to survive a Soviet first strike occurring after some warning.

The MX missile program should be canceled. Instead, existing Minuteman missiles could be improved by installing more advanced warheads on the Minuteman missiles which do not already have them, and by upgrading the guidance systems on all Minuteman III's. Terminating the MX missile program would result in total savings of at least $18.4 billion. Upgrading the Minuteman III force to achieve the same hard target capability would cost $4.4 billion less.

Furthermore, the Scowcroft Commission recommended the development of the Midgetman, a mobile, single-warhead, small intercontinental ballistic missile that would not be vulnerable to a preemptive strike. Research and development of a Midgetman type of system should be continued. In fact, the Pentagon should consider abandoning ICBM's in fixed silos—MX or Minuteman—in favor of less vulnerable systems.

For example, the sea leg of America's strategic triad is virtually invulnerable to a preemptive strike. The Trident submarine is an undetectable, vigilant deterrent. We should continue our deployment of the Trident submarine. But we don't need to put new Trident II missiles in these submarines; the current Trident I with MIRV capability will serve as well and save us billions of dollars.

In short, the United States can continue to provide a strong deterrent by upgrading existing weapon systems, and emphasizing the continued procurement of such systems as the Trident submarine, and the implementation of our cruise missile technology.

Not only should nuclear weapons systems be subjected to careful review, other procurement programs could also be terminated or slowed. For example, chemical weapons have little military value. This cut would save an additional $7 billion over the projected life of the chemical weapons program. At least $1.7 billion could be saved in fiscal year 1985 if the Pentagon reduces its emphasis on continental air defense and the procurement of space defense systems. In addition, procurement of systems which require more thorough testing to allow technical problems to be worked out, such as the Sergeant York Division air defense system, the CG-47 Aegis air defense cruiser, and the DDG-51 Aegis air defense destroyer, should be canceled or slowed to ease current budgetary pressures and to eliminate the "bugs" before we buy the full orders.

CONVENTIONAL AND TROOP READINESS NEEDS

Together Congress and the administration have begun the task of revitalizing our conventional forces, improving the quality of life for our military men and women. Our service personnel deserve adequate pay and the best training and equipment possible. However, while total military spending has nearly doubled in 4 years, our conventional forces, along with readiness and sustainability accounts, have not been allocated a proportionate share of the Pentagon's increased spending requests. Our readiness accounts, must be adequately funded and properly managed so that needed equipment is available and money is not wasted. Unfortunatley, if we don't make decisions to cut from the big ticket weapons, defense spending cuts will unwisely come out of operations and maintenance or readiness accounts.

The United States and our NATO allies must commit an appropriate share of our defense dollars to conventional forces in order to respond quickly to any potential crisis. We should continue our demand that the European NATO members begin to pick up a greater share of these costs.

I also support continued development of our air- and sea-lift capability to transport men and equipment quickly to where they are needed. This allows a more flexible response to a potential crisis. Strong conventional forces make it less likely that nuclear weapons will be used in a confrontation.

In addition, we must commit the resources to sustain a continued presence of amphibious forces and carrier battle groups in the Persian Gulf, the Atlantic, or Mediterranean, and the Far East. However, our goal of a 600-ship Navy can be achieved more economically by spreading the acquisition of ships over a longer period of time and by investing in smaller vessels.

Finally, greater support should be given training and equipment of the Navy and Army Reserves and the National Guard. The Air Force Reserves are currently recognized to be well prepared, but additional funding may also be required in this area. Moneys directed to these reserve units are investments in a strong defense at about 10 cents on the dollar when compared to active military personnel.

A WORD ABOUT PROCUREMENT PRACTICES

The Pentagon displays a chronic tendency to prepare budget plans that underestimate weapons costs. The military procurement process remains highly inefficient because of little competition and poor management. This situation leads to further strains on our budget. Cost overruns on major weapons systems at the Pentagon are the rule rather than the exception. Spare parts often cost the Pentagon 10 to 100 times more than these same items would cost if they had been purchased in a more efficient manner. For example, Congressman BEDELL, a member of the House Small Business Committee, purchased 21 common tools from a neighborhood hardware store and paid $92.44. Unbelievably, the Navy spend $10,168.56 for these same items.

Americans receive a warranty on appliances, cars, and other major purchases. And yet, the Pentagon has not asked for—in fact, resists—warranties on its equipment and weapon system purchases. In every case, the taxpayer ends up paying more.

I commend Congressman BEDELL, Congresswoman BOXER, Congressman MCNULTY, and others for their efforts to require the Pentagon to use the marketplace. Common sense requires that we buy the best weapons, weapons that work, and pay the lowest possible price. Increased competition and the imposition of warranties are steps in the right direction. These and other commonsense procurement and management techniques such as those recommended by the Grace Commission can save several billions per year in military spending.

TOUGH CHOICES

Unfortunately, this administration and we in Congress have not provided the leadership for this commonsense strong defense strategy. Several votes to reduce military costs significantly have failed because budget and strategic considerations were not adequately debated or understood. As the debate on the defense appropriations bill begins, we in Congress must make the tough but necessary choices and ask the question: How much can we afford to spend?

Americans agree that we must maintain a strong defense. Americans also agree that a $200 billion budget deficit threatens our economy.

And so, when it comes to matters of defense spending, it is not a matter of who is a hawk and who is a dove. We all must be owls—we must make wise decisions. We can abide by spending limits by making realistic choices. For the sake of the budget and the economy, we must establish and stick to an affordable long-term defense funding profile. I believe we can maintain a strong defense while moderating military increases and spending defense dollars more wisely. America can maintain a defense that is second to none—one that is effective, but just as important, one that is affordable.●

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I was not present for rollcall votes Nos. 277, 279, and 280 on Wednesday, June 27. Had I been present on the House floor, I would have cast my votes in the following manner:

Rollcall No. 277, Obey amendment to Treasury-Postal Service appropriations "no".

Rollcall No. 279, Nelson amendment to Treasury-Postal Service appropriations "aye."

Rollcall No. 280, final passage of Treasury-Postal Service appropriations "yea."●

ACID RAIN COSTS OF H.R. 5314 EXCEED $65 BILLION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. DINGELL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DINGELL Mr. Speaker, several months ago I asked the Congressional Budget Office [CBO] to provide an analysis of the costs of the acid rain provisions of H.R. 5314. The CBO estimates those costs over 20 years to the Nation's ratepayers at over $65 billion. That is a staggering sum.

I want to share that analysis, as well as a letter from Ohio's Consumer's Counsel. Both documents follow:

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, DC, June 12, 1984.

MEMORANDUM

To: House Energy and Commerce Committee.
From: John Thomasian.
Subject: Response to Chairman Dingell's Request on Acid Rain Control Legislation.

This memorandum summarizes the key results of our analysis in response to Chairman Dingell's request. With few changes, these results are similar to those I previously discussed with you. Please call me at 226-2940 if you have any questions.

SUMMARY OF RESULTS

Our analysis shows that the electricity fee outlined in H.R. 5314 would not cover the 90 percent of phase 1 and 2 control costs called for in the program. To provide a trust fund covering the 90 percent of capital costs required by the bill, the fee would need to raise roughly $29 billion in 1983 dollars. The original fee system contained in H.R. 5314 would raise only $18 billion in 1983 dollars, or only 62 percent of the required funds.

In addition to our findings on the original plan of H.R. 5314, we also analyzed two modified approaches that would provide the needed revenue for the program:

1. Allow the original 1.0 mill per kilowatthour fee to be adjusted each year to fully account for inflation, and extend its deadline through 1997; and

2. Retain the original fee, holding it constant over time, and extend its deadline through 2003.

INDEXED FEE APPROACH

Table 1 shows the year-by-year trust fund balance (in nominal dollars) of the original program but with an indexed fee levied through 1997. As the table shows, the fund is able to retire roughly $6.7 billion (in nominal dollars) of capital in 1988. After 1988, the fund continues to retire the capital as fast as possible through 1998, the year the subsidy requirement is fulfilled. The remaining money in the fund would then collect interest, and could remain with the Treasury or be returned to the utilities that were taxed.

Over the course of the program, the fund would collect roughly $29 billion from the states and distribute over $27 billion in subsidies (all in 1983 dollars). The total cost of the program over the period 1985 through 2005 would be over $65 billion (1983 dollars), which includes the cost of emissions controls ($63.4 billion in 1983 dollars) and excess fee collections ($2 billion in 1983 dollars). Table 2 shows the nationwide totals and state-by-state balances of the program. The first column reports the amount of fees collected, the second reports the fund's subsidy provided under the program, the third column reports the total control costs to the state over the 1985-2005 period, and the fourth column reports the net costs of the control program to the states (all in 1983 dollars). This latter figure simply represents the difference between the tax plus the control costs, minus the subsidy.

As Table 2 shows, the electricity fee would transfer funds collected from many western and low-polluting eastern states to the Midwest. Nevertheless, even with the fee and subsidy system, several midwestern and eastern states—Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Illinois, and Missouri—would bear the majority of program costs.

CONSTANT FEE APPROACH

Trust fund performance under the second alternative examined—that is, holding the 1.0 mill fee constant and extending it through 2003—is shown in Table 3. While revenue collected each year would rise because of electricity growth, it would remain lower than that collected under the indexed-fee option. For this reason, less capital could be retired each year by the fund than shown in Table 1, and the trust would take longer to meet its subsidy objectives.

Overall, the non-indexed fee approach would cost somewhat more than the indexed fee approach—$71.7 versus $65.4 billion in 1983 dollars—because of the higher interest costs associated with the longer payout schedule of the constant fee.[1] Table 4 shows information on the fee, subsidy, control costs, and net payment under the program for each state. Generally, the costs are similar although somewhat higher than Table 2.

[1] The size of fund at the beginning of the payout period will affect interest costs. A larger initial fund balance allows a greater initial capital payment, thus reducing later interest charges. For this reason, higher fees over short periods may save more than lower fees levied over longer periods.

COMPARISON OF ELECTRICITY AND RATE EFFECTS

One measure of the fee and subsidy approach is its effect on electricity prices. Without a fee and subsidy system, the original emissions control program outlined in H.R. 5314 would create large electricity price increases by 1992 in five states—Kentucky (16.5 percent increase), Indiana (13.6 percent increase), Kansas (11.3 percent increase), Ohio (10.7 percent increase), and Missouri (10.1 percent increase). Under either fee approach examined, emission control costs in high-polluting states are partially subsidized by fees collected from low-polluting states. Thus, electricity price increases are tempered in the highest paying areas—the Midwest and portions of the East. Table 5 shows these projected effects in 1992, the year of peak rate increases, and compares them with those under the two subsidy alternatives examined.

As shown in Table 5, without a fee and subsidy system, electricity prices could rise as high as 16.5 percent (Kentucky). However, under either of the fee and subsidy options examined, such peak prices would fall to under 12 percent, but other low-polluting states would experience higher fee costs.

METHODOLOGY

Costs for the emissions control program were obtained from Robert Friedman of the Office of Technology Assessment. These costs were estimated for OTA in support of their analysis of H.R. 3200, the original "Waxman" proposal later incorporated into H.R. 5314.

State-by-state costs and the effect of the fee and subsidy program on state balances and electricity prices were estimated separately, using an accounting model developed by CBO. In analysis of the basic program and variants, the main assumptions applied include:

The capital payments from the trust fund would start in 1988, the year construction would need to begin to meet a 1990 deadline;

That the long-term inflation rate after 1985 would be 4.5 percent;

That the interest rate on the trust fund would be 8 percent;

That the interest rates on capital costs would be 10.8 percent; and

That the affected utilities would issue bonds (or similar instruments) to cover air pollution control costs and that 90 percent of such debt would be retired as soon as possible without interest penalties, through trust fund payments.

To estimate the trust fund revenue, fees were charged on electricity produced from all coal, oil, gas, and hydroelectric power plants. The annual quantity of electricity produced subject to the fee was adjusted to reflect a 3 percent growth rate per year.

Payments from the trust fund were assumed to occur at the beginning of each year, at which time administrative expenses also would be withdrawn from the fund. Administrative expenses were withdrawn each year at the following rates, adjusted for inflation: $25 million (in 1983 dollars) each year except in 1992, and $50 million (in 1983 dollars) in 1992 to reflect higher expenses for the first year of the emissions control program. Annual interest in the fund balance was inputed each year after payments and administrative costs were deducted, and fee revenues were included at year's end when collected.

To determine the effect of the fee and control program on electricity consumers in each state, price effects were allocated on the basis of assumptions about electricity-sharing practices among states. States sharing electricity production were considered members of power pools (see below).

Pool	States involved
New England Power Pool	Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island.
Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland Interconnection.	Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, District of Columbia.
Virginia-Carolinas Reliabilities Group	Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina.
Southern Company and Other Systems	Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi.
Middle South Utilities Company, Gulf States Company, and Other Systems.	Arkansas, Louisiana.
Mid-Continent Area Power Pool	North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Minnesota, Iowa.
Northwest Power Pool	Washington, Oregon, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Utah.
California Power Pool and Other Systems.	California, Nevada.

To simplify calculations, we assumed that pools conformed to state borders. In practice, pooling agreements subdivide some states and include such portions in multi-state pools. To minimize inaccuracy, the power pools chosen for this analysis were ones that primarily conform to state borders. States not part of the specific pools in the list were treated separately.

Electricity generated within a pool—hence, electricity price increases—were apportioned to each state on the basis of its ratio of fossil-fuel energy consumption to all forms of electricity consumption within the pool. The final price increase to consumers also included transmission losses, estimated at 10 percent. Thus, a fee of 1 mill per kilowatt-hour on fossil-fuel electricity production would equal a 1.1 mill per kilowatt-hour fee on electricity consumption within a state receiving all its power from fossil fuel-fired plants.

OFFICE OF THE CONSUMER'S COUNSEL,
Columbus, OH, June 11, 1984.

Hon. Representative JOHN D. DINGELL, House Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE DINGELL: The Ohio Office of the Consumers' Counsel represents the residential customers of Ohio's investor owned utilities. On May 23, 1984, the Consumer's Counsel Governing Board approved a resolution in support of the principles that acid rain control legislation should be cost effective in reducing acidic depositions and should contain a comprehensive national funding program. A copy of Board Resolution 84-3 is enclosed.

The Office of the Consumers' Counsel [OCC] is concerned by the severe impact which acid rain legislation would have on electric rates in Ohio and other states. We are also aware that acid rain, particularly acidic depositions in ecologically sensitive areas of the United States and Canada, is a national problem and that Ohio must be part of a fair and effective national solution. OCC, therefore, urges Congress to consider specific measures to minimize and broadly spread the costs of sulfur-dioxide and nitrogen-oxide emission controls.

OCC has studied the rate impact of the Waxman-Sikorski, National Acid Deposition Control Act of 1983 (introduced and hereafter referred to as H. R. 3400). OCC estimates that H. R. 3400, which includes a partial national funding program, would increase average Ohio electric rates at least 8.6%. This increase would cost consumers more than half a billion dollars annually. The rate impact of H. R. 3400 would fall disproportionately on customers of the Cleveland Electric Illuminating Company [CEI] and Ohio Power Company, which serve economically depressed areas of Northern and Eastern Ohio. CEI and Ohio Power rates would go up at least 10.5% and 14.1% respectively. The implementation of a similar SO_2 emission control program without the funding provisions contained in H. R. 3400 would increase average Ohio electric rates by at least 16.9%, or more than one billion dollars per year.

OCC regards its estimate of the average annual cost of H. R. 3400 to be extremely conservative. Among the factors which contribute to the conservatison of our estimates are:

A. The baseline cost date utilized for OCC's estimates incorporates difficulty factors for diseconomies of scale and coal quality which are substantially lower than those used in other studies.

B. OCC estimates do not include AFUDC (Allowance for Funds Used During Construction) which other studies have placed at ten (10) to fifty (50) percent of scrubber costs.

C. OCC estimates uniformly assume that scrubbers will have a twenty (20) year depreciable life beginning in 1990; this assumption is unrealistic for many of the units studied.

Since we have made a conservative estimate, the actual cost to consumers of H.R. 3400 could prove to be substantially greater then OCC's estimates.

Rate increases of the magnitude estimated in our study would have a severe impact on Ohio's lagging economy and on consumers, particularly the 20% of residential electric customers whose incomes fall below HEAP low income guidelines. To minimize the rate impact of acid rain legislation, consideration should be given to whether proposals are cost effective in reducing acidic depositions and include a fair national funding program.

Many of the acid rain control programs which have been proposed in Congress are not cost effective in reducing acidic depositions.

First, several bills allocate much larger percentage emission reductions to mid-western states which do not contain ecologically sensitive areas than are allocated to the states most damaged by acidic depositions. For example, H.R. 3400 would require a reduction in utility SO_2 emissions of 66.9% in Illinois, 76.1% in Indiana, 70.3% in Kentucky, and 73.2% in Ohio, while prescribing reductions of 16.6% in Maine, 37.8% in Massachusetts, 46.2% in New York, 19.8% in North Carolina, 15.8% in Virginia and no reduction in Vermont.[1] This disparity flies in the face of the National Academy of Sciences' suggestion of equal percentage reductions across the Eastern United States. Moreover, it is inconsistent with the Academy's conclusion that, "as a general rule of thumb . . . the farther a source is from a given receptor site, the smaller its influence on that site will be per unit of mass emitted."[2]

Requiring larger percentage reductions in SO_2 emissions in Ohio and other mid-western states is not a cost effective to reducing acidic depositions in North America's ecologically sensitive areas. The models constructed by the U.S.-Canada Memorandum of Intent Working Group on the average indicate that to reduce acidic depositions in sensitive areas of the Northeast, "it would be 4.5 times more effective to reduce one ton of SO_2 emissions in New York than in Ohio."[3] Consideration should be given to developing a cost effective allocation of emission reductions based upon the best available scientific models to achieve significant deposition reductions in the most seriously threatened sensitive areas.

Second, the commercial development of emerging control technologies such as limestone injection multi-state burners [LIMB], fluidized bed boilers, and improved coal washing facilities, offers opportunities to control SO_2 emissions at costs substantially below that of current scrubber technology. Unfortunately, many of the proposals before Congress offer neither financial support nor sufficient time for the development on a commercial scale of theses alternate technologies. A major effort to accelerate the commercial development of these technologies could reduce the cost to consumers of acid rain legislation and save thousands of jobs in the high sulfur coal industry.

Third, some proposals for SO_2 emission reductions mandate the installation of scrubbers without regard for economic considerations. For example, twenty-nine (29) of the thirty-eight (38) Ohio units on which H.R. 3400 (as introduced) would require the installation of scrubbers either would be over thirty (30) years old when the scrubbers would be installed or have a capacity under 250Mw. Such old and small units are generally not economic candidates for expensive, capital intensive scrubber technology.

OCC supports the concept of national funding for all capital and operating costs associated with the implementation of acid rain legislation. Ohio's residential customers pay the eighth highest electric rates in the nation.[4] It would be unfair to add to those rates a disproportionate share of the costs of an acid rain clean-up. Moreover, Ohio's privately owned utilities have invested far more (54% more) in air pollution control equipment than utilities in any other state.[5] As a result of such investments, Ohio's SO_2 emissions have dropped to their lowest level since 1960. These investments are being paid for by Ohio consumers.

Since the cost of SO_2 emission reductions will not be paid by the management or shareholders of polluting utilities, the concpet of "polluter pay" has little relevence to the debate over funding for acid rain controls. The utilities costs will be fully passed on to consumers through cost-of-service regulation. In the absence of a comprehensive federal funding program, consumers' costs will vary widely both among the states and among localities within each state. The burden of a national commitment to reducing acidic depositions should not be allowed to fall disproportionately on consumers in certain states and localities.

We would be glad to discuss with you how to achieve a fair and effective solution to the problem of acid rain. If you have questions or would like more information, please contact me or OCC's Federal Legislative Liaison, Ms. Janet Caldwell at (614) 466-8574.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM A. SPRATLEY,
Consumers' Counsel.

RESOLUTION OF THE CONSUMERS' COUNSEL GOVERNING BOARD, STATE OF OHIO

[Authorizing actions in support of the principles that acid rain control legislation should be cost effective in reducing acid depositions and incorporate a fair national funding program.]

Whereas, Acid Rain, particularly acidic depositions in sensitive areas of this country and Canada, is a national problem and Ohio must be part of a fair and effective national solution;

Whereas, these acidic depositions have been associated with risks to aquatic life, crops, forests and water resources, which risks are not fully addressed by current clean air laws;

Whereas, the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee has approved S. 768 calling for a 10 million ton reduction in sulfur-dioxide (SO_2) emissions in 31 eastern states;

Whereas, 120 members of the U.S. House of Representatives co-sponsored H.R. 3400, which called for a ten million ton reduction in SO_2 emissions and the installation of scrubbers at 50 large utility powerplants, including the Ashtabula, Avon Lake, Burger, Cardinal, Conesville, Eastlake, Gavin, Kyger Creek, and Muskingum powerplants in Ohio;

Whereas, any legislation to reduce SO_2 emissions will substantially increase electric rates in Ohio; for example, OCC conservatively estimates that H.R. 3400 would result in at least an 8.6% increase in average Ohio electric rates and that this rate increase will exceed a half billion dollars annually;

Whereas, this rate increase will be borne, in part, by the 20% of Ohio's residential consumers who are already considered to be low income consumers under HEAP guidelines;

Whereas, H.R. 3400 would mandate the installation of scrubbers on old and small generating units which are not appropriate candidates for scrubbers, including twenty-nine (29) of the thirty-eight (38) Ohio units which either will be over 30 years old when scrubbers would be installed or have a capacity under 250 Mw, substantially increasing the costs of achieving SO_2 emission reductions;

Whereas, S. 768 and H.R. 3400 do not allocate SO_2 emission reductions among the states proportionately to each state's total SO_2 emissions, and the allocations contained in these bills are inconsistent with the conclusion of the National Academy of Sciences that it "cannot objectively predict the consequences for deposition in ecologically sensitive areas of changing the spatial pattern of emissions in eastern North America, such as by reducing emissions in one area by a larger percentage than in other areas";

Whereas, S. 768 and H.R. 3400 would require larger percentage reductions in SO_2 emissions in Ohio and other states which do not contain ecologically sensitive areas than would be required in states with sensitive areas, and the allocation of emission reductions contained in these bills is inconsistent with the finding of the National Academy of Sciences that "as a general rule of thumb . . . the farther a source is from a given receptor site, the smaller its influence on that site will be per unit mass emitted";

Whereas, the allocations of emission reductions in S. 768 and H.R. 3400 do not provide a cost effective approach to reducing acidic depositions in sensitive areas; for example, the models constructed by the U.S.-Canada Memorandum of Intent Working Group suggest that a unit of emissions reduction in New York State would be approximately four and half times more effective than a similar emissions reduction in Ohio in reducing acidic depositions in sensitive areas of the Adirondacks;

Whereas, S. 768 and H.R. 3400 fail to include financial support or allow sufficient time for the commercial development of alternate technologies, such as Limestone Injection Multistage Burners (LIMB), fluidized bed boilers or improved coal washing techniques, which would be less costly than scrubbers and could save thousands of Ohio jobs;

Whereas, reducing emissions of nitrogen oxides (NO_x) is generally less expensive than reducing sulfur dioxide (SO) emissions; nitrates make a significant contribution to acidic depositions in sensitive areas; and a cost effective program to control acidic depositions should give consideration to some form of NO_x for SO_2 emission reduction tradeoff;

Whereas, a comprehensive national funding program covering construction and operating costs is needed to prevent emission controls from imposing an unfair burden on states such as Ohio, in that Energy Information Administration data shows that Ohio residential consumers face the eighth highest electric rates in the nation and that Ohio utilities have invested far more (54% more) in air pollution control equipment than utilities in any other state;

Whereas, in the absence of a comprehensive national funding program, pending legislation would impose disproportionate rate increases on economically depressed areas of northern and eastern Ohio; for example, OCC conservatively estimates that H.R. 3400 would increase Ohio Power electric rates by at least 14.1% and Cleveland Electric Illuminating rates by at least 10.5%;

Whereas, acid rain control legislation should seek to avoid unnecessarily increasing the substantial economic burden which controls will impose on Ohio's residential consumers of electricity and on Ohio's economy; therefore be it

Resolved that the Governing Board of the Office of the Consumers' Counsel authorizes the Consumers' Counsel to take all appropriate measures to urge Congress to consider the principles that acid rain control legislation should present a cost effective program for reducing acidic depositions in ecologically sensitive areas and that such legislation should include a comprehensive national funding program covering construction and operating costs, in order to develop a fair and effective national solution to the acid rain problem.

CURRENT LEVEL OF SPENDING AND REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1984

(Mr. JONES of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the procedures of the Committee on the Budget and section 311(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, I am submitting to the RECORD a letter to the Speaker advising him of the current level of spending and revenues for fiscal year 1984.

COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, June 29, 1984.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On January 30, 1976, the Committee on the Budget outlined the procedure which it had adopted in connection with its responsibilities under Section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to provide estimates of the current level of revenues and spending.

Pursuant to Committee Rule 10, I am herewith transmitting the status report under H. Con. Res. 91, the First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 1984. This report reflects the adjusted resolution of October 25, 1983, and the current CBO estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues. The attachments show that latest estimate for the current level of fiscal year 1984 spending and divide that amount among committees.

The procedural situation with regard to the spending ceiling is affected this year by Section 5(b) of H. Con. Res. 91. As I explained during debate on the conference report on that resolution, enforcement against breaches of the spending ceiling under Section 311(a) of the Budget Act do not apply where a measure would not cause a committee to exceed its appropriate allocation pursuant to Section 302(a) of the Budget Act. In the House, the appropriate 302(a) allocation includes "new discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" only. It should be noted that under this procedure neither the total level of outlays nor a committee's outlay allocation is considered. This exception is only provided because an automatic budget resolution is in effect and will cease to apply if Congress revises the budget resolution for fiscal year 1984.

The intent of the Section 302(a) "discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" subceiling provided by Section 5(b) of the resolution is to protect a committee that has stayed within its spending allocation—discretionary budget authority and new entitlement authority—from points of order if the total spending ceiling has been breached for reasons outside of its control. The 302(a) allocations to House committees made pursuant to the conference report on H. Con. Res. 91 were printed in the Congressional Record, June 22, 1983, H. 4326. Adjustments to such allocations made pursuant to Section 2 of House Concurrent Resolution 91, the reserve fund, are reflected in House Reports 98-313, 98-354, 98-381, and 98-439.

The attached tables show where each committee currently stands compared to its 302(a) allocation of discretionary budget authority and of new entitlement authority.

With best wishes.

Sincerely,

JAMES R. JONES,
Chairman.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SAMUEL C. CHANDLER—DALY CITY'S CONGRESSIONAL PUBLIC SERVICE AWARD RECIPIENT

HON. TOM LANTOS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to announce that the Congressional Public Service Advisory Committee for Daly City has named Samuel C. Chandler as the recipient of the 1984 Congressional Public Service Award for Daly City.

Mr. Chandler has served Daly City as its librarian for 25 years, during which time he has done much to add to the culture of the community. He has researched, collected, and preserved historical documents, photographs, and both a written and oral history of the area.

One of his most significant accomplishments was his authorship of "Gateway to the Peninsula," a history of Daly City and its environs. For this outstanding history, Sam Chandler received the Award of Excellence from the California Historical Society.

When asked about his professional philosophy, Sam Chandler explained:

The purpose of a public library is to improve the quality of life for every section of the community. It is a resource that has been established to assist children, young adults and adults of every profession, trade, calling and occupation. It caters to every shade of opinion, prejudice and belief; every degree of education and mentality; to the understanding or narrow-mindedness of all ages, of both sexes. Community service is its goal and its only purpose for existing.

Sam Chandler has embodied this philosophy, not only in his professional career of serving Daly City, but also in a number of other areas—Government, history, the arts, service organizations, and young people. His leadership in many city, county, and State service organizations demonstrate the implementation of his personal philosophy and public service.

He served as secretary of the San Mateo County Historical Society, a member of the County History Resources Board, Director of "Victorian Days" at San Mateo Park. One of his lasting accomplishments was the organization of the Daly City Chapter of the California Historical Society.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the Daly City Congressional Public Service Advisory Committee for its excellent choice, and I congratulate Sam Chandler for his outstanding record of volunteer public service.●

NICARAGUAN PRIVATE ENTERPRISE SAYS "ENOUGH!"

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to read the following speech by the president of the Nicaraguan Private Enterprise Council. He expresses the frustration of many with the ruling Sandinista regime.

SPEECH GIVEN TO ITS MEMBERS BY ING. ENRIQUE BOLANOS, PRESIDENT OF INDE AND COSEP DURING THE ANNUAL NATIONAL GENERAL ASSEMBLY CELEBRATED IN MANAGUA AT CINEMA DOS ON MAY 22, 1984

In August of 1983, we had the opportunity to get together with the businessmen of Colombia and Venezuela. As COSEP, we participated with prominent members of political, labor and civic democratic groups, in a series of reunions in Venezuela with different political, business, union and religious sectors, also with the then President Herrera Campins, with the object of expressing our interest for a true democratic process for Nicaragua.

On August 7, 1983, the Nicaraguan democratic groups delivered to the President of Venezuela the document entitled "Basis for Peace in Central America", which was later distributed to each of the Presidents of the Contadora Group. With satisfaction we were able to see that in the reunion of the Contadora Group of the 9th of September of 1983, it is included in the regional treaties, of military aspects and bilateral agreements, our proposed concept of internal democratization as our only true road to obtain peace in Central America. We may say that this has been the work of the democratic Nicaraguan groups and it has been a work of all those who believe and sustain that we can not find peace, if this peace is not based on a true democracy which offers the real opportunity for a citizen to elect freely and without restrictions its own leaders.

In October of 1983 and within the international scene, we had to make a presentation before the Kissinger Commission. Before said commission, we maintained the principle that the economic development of the peoples of Central America will be possible only when a democratic structure exists in all the area, legitimized through the popular and secret vote and within the frame of total liberty of the people of all and each one of the countries of the area.

In November of 1983, we participated in the annual Reunion of the Conference of Central America and the Caribbean. We also used this forum to expose our concerns and express our experiences.

In December of 1983, we were part of a delegation of the Democratic Coordination, in a trip that was made to different countries in western Europe, whose results in favor of our democratic cause, began immediately to show up. On the 7th and 8th of this month, we participated in the 44th Ordinary Assembly of COPAMEX of Mexico (The equivalent of INDE) whose theme was "Society for the Government or Government for the Society". With legitimate pride, modesty aside, we must inform you that the dissertation of COSEP, because of its profound contents, stood out from among the nine expositions closing thus with a flair, this theme.

As members of INDE and COSEP, we have spoken with the small businessmen of Niquinohomo, as also with the President of Venezuela. We have dialogued with the small coffee growers of Matagalpa, as well as occupying forums of international prominence. We have shared the anxieties of the members of the CO-OPS in Diriomo, of the businessmen of Jinotega, at the same time that we have carried our message to the Aztec capital. Finally, we have done everything that you recommended and all that our conscience has dictated.

In Nicaragua we have gotten together with delegates from Governments and representatives of Congress of the Parliaments of Germany, Canada, United States of America, England, Venezuela, Mexico, Sweden and other countries. The encounters we had had with different delegations from countries interested in the Nicaraguan problem had been innumerable. Also, we have given interviews to hundreds of journalists the world over; those who have visited us to know the position and opinions of the Nicaraguan private sector.

It is also of great importance to point out and by contrast, that INDE and COSEP have not had any reunion with the Government. We have not been invited nor have we requested it. The Government tries to ignore us as an institution and that has been their policy, and maybe one of our strengths. They try to ignore us, eventhough daily we are attacked and our advocates insulted. Daily they dedicate headlines and large editorials in all of their controlled communication medias. Not only the Government, but all other sectors of the country and the whole world observe us. All are attentive of our attitudes.

At the end of July, 1983, INDE received a letter from the President of the State Council, Commander Carlos Munez, asking us to reintegrate into this organization. In coordination with the other councils of the private sector, we refused to reintegrate ourselves into this State Council as we considered that the conditions that motivated our withdrawal in November, 1980, not only still persist, but had deepened and still continue, at this moment, to deepen even more.

The attitudes and activities that I have related, added to the brave activities and attitudes of 1980, 1981, and 1982 have made a gap in the international public opinion, and at the national level, also in the Government of the Sandinistas ("Frentista") party. During more than four years, we have been waging a titanic battle to prevent menacing totalitarianism, to detain a galloping cubanism and a growing marxism, thus also to try to prevent a total annihilation of the private sector, and more than anything, not to totally lose our liberty. We consider, in principle, that our work has had results. We have made them slow down on the totalitarian process, we have made them delay the totalitarian process, we have forced them into a political parenthesis and into a half opening, to which they ideologically are not accustomed to. We have obtained, at the cost of farms, jailing and even death, to contribute in a large scale to put them in an inconvenient situation.

As things were going in 1981, who would think then that the private sector could still subsist in 1984? Such as the process was outlined in June, 1982, who would assure us that today our organizations would still exist? We have not succeeded in everything; nevertheless, we have gained much and from day to day we continue to gain more.

In 1984, the situation is different from four years ago. This year we face another political situation and before a possible supposed legalization of a system of government that does not have the support of the great majorities nor with a solid international recognition. The first four years were of tension and to convince us all that the economic plan adopted was not practical. The struggle we must bear this year will be different. We, in the private sector, must act with a great monolitical unity which we have maintained until now, as well as the new structural organization which we are reenforcing so that it may also serve as a greater endorsement for the democratic political parties, and especially to the Democratic Coordinator Ramiro Sacasa Guerrero, in his corresponding patriotic role. That is why under no circumstances should we permit that due to a fraudulent election, a marxist type constitution be imposed on us, in which the destiny of Nicaragua be sealed forever with a totalitarian plan that, due to its own nature and materialistic conception, is hateful. They have offered us a political opening, but more than an opening, it looks like a small slit in a screen patched with marxist literature and exterior propaganda, but internally it is not more than a continuation of the Law of Emergency, the censure of the press and the growing molestation agains those of us who demand liberty and true democracy.

A clever electoral law was given to us, made to the exclusive measure of the Sandinista party and which assures them of a continuation of power; and, an electoral process filled with deceit and fraud that beforehand we can already shout: Don't even run because you're out!

All this will not be pluralistic, nor democratic and the result will be the continuing deterioration of our economy and the prolonging of the suffering of the Nicaraguan people.

We were clear in the document that we jointly signed with a group of political parties and democratic labor unions on the 24th of December and is entitled "A Step Toward Democracy: Free Electrions".

In that document we ask, among other things, a sincere and ample document to establish the basis of the electoral process. The aforementioned document simply has not been taken into account. They did not want to listen and they attempt to go ahead with a political plan that contradicts the liberty that we should all have in order to choose our own system of government and our own leaders.

In 1984, the private sector cannot remain on the fringe of political accomplishments, because we, before the businessmen, are and will always be preoccupied citizens for the future of our country. Like INDE and COSEP, we cannot nor do we claim the conquest of power, since this is the exclusive mission of the political parties. Nevertheless, it is not only our right, but our duty to influence in the destiny of Nicaragua. As an organized private sector, we do not favor any political party, but we are in favor of liberty, of true democracy and authentic pluralism. We cannot forget that political plans condition economic programs, and that is why the economy and political scene should preoccupy us. As businessmen, we also cannot forget that we are fighting an ideological war. The Sandinista party wants to establish a centralized and state owned economic system, wanting control of everyone and all. A one and only great patron: The State. On the other hand, we the businessmen want to live in freedom under a free market system, with opportunities for everyone, without lines nor shortages and with the hope of educating our children in complete liberty.

This is an ideological fight and not only of political parties. This is a fight of opposing systems and moral contradictions and not of historical parallels. This is the decisive fight of the Nicaraguan people. Nobody can be at the margin because being there means giving up before the fight. It is like being buried before dying. It is not being Nicaraguan and what is worse, not being a man.

The private sector fights and actively participates in the right of the country. INDE is preoccupied with the harassment of the small shoemaker of Masaya, who has to pay a high political cost to obtain his raw material. INDE is preoccupied for the small businessmen of Boaco, who has to belong to a Sandinista organization in order to obtain products to sell. INDE is preoccupied for the tailor of Catarina who is made to go to a reunion of the Sandinista party in order to obtain material and work.

Our private sector is preoccupied for the coffee grower of Matagalpa, for the industrialist of the North Highway, for the cotton farmer of Chinandega and for the businessman of the Centro Comercial Managua shopping center. We fight for all of them; and we fight to find liberty, because without liberty, there is no work; because man is nourished with bread, truth and liberty. Man with truth and liberty, but without bread, grows weak and cannot perform. But, man with bread, but without truth and liberty, is not a man.

In view of the actual situation, we cannot extricate economy from politics, because, as we said before, politics dictate the economy in all the country, especially in present day Nicaragua.

These political dictates to which we have been submitted, have caused, as we have said in the past, a deep economic crisis.

To explain in detail in this report the grave Nicaraguan economic situation would be long and tedious, but the following data is enough to describe, at great depths, our difficult situation.

INFLATION

Since 1978, the following are the increments in the price index: 5 percent in 1978, 50 percent in 1979, 55 percent in 1980, 60 percent in 1981, 82 percent in 1982 and 95 percent in 1983. It means that the price index has risen 437 percent. Something that cost us 100 Cordobas in 1977, cost 437 Cordobas in 1983.

Given, that salaries have been frozen, the public finds it hard to maintain his life style and this is not only due to the wellknown shortages. Let's say a person, for example, an accountant, who in 1977 earned 3,000 Cordobas, could have bought 20 pairs of shoes for himself and his family with the product of a months work. On the contrary, today, earning, let's say double—6,000 Cordobas—perhaps he could not even buy 10 pairs. Let's not forget that shoes are a national product.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION

The level of production and consumption per person are at the same level as in 1962. At the level of 22 years ago! Due to the deviations of this Revolution, we are in such a bad state of production and consumption as we were 22 years ago. And, thus, I could continue to give data after data: about the huge external debt that has mortgaged even our grandchildren; about the enormous shortage of money to buy raw materials; about exports which are extremely low; and about the shortage—of everything—each time increasing. The two words most used in Nicaragua today are: There's none. (No Hay.) The worst thing is the lack of hope and our only comfort is knowing that we are better today than we will be tomorrow.

The words spoken by Enrique Dreyfuss before the INDE Assembly of March 11th, two years ago are prophetic: "The coming years will be difficult economically and levels of production will diminish, and for which, we will have more inflation, more unemployment and more general dissatisfaction". In the same way, with Enrique's permission, I now use these words to foretell the future.

Due to this tremendous economic crisis, we can foretell, without being afraid to make a mistake, that if the Sandinistas dare to—which they would never do—give us, the Nicaraguan people, true elections, reasonably free and honest . . . we can all be sure that the Frente Sandinista would lose by a great majority. This happens in every democratic country: When the economic situation deteriorates, the party in power loses the elections. The Sandinista party is to blame and has to pay the consequences in the election ballots.

Moreover, we all know the enormous frustrations and rejection of the totalitarian plan, a rejection in all the sectors of Nicaragua. In all the national scene, the rejection ran with great leaps and it is expressed more each time publicly. Because of this, we know and—the Sandinista Government knows and fears—that the Sandinistas would lose a just and honest election by a great majority. There is hope in all of this, a great hope for the public rejection of the totalitarian system.

There is hope because in Nicaragua there still exists enough room for everyone, for the majorities and minorities. There is hope because there are enough strong people—like yourself—to help the weak. There is hope because there is enough interest to take care of the wombs of our people. And, above all, there is hope because Nicaragua has children who really love Her. Her biggest hope, then, is you.

The big menace that the sum of all these hopes means is that the Sandinistas, up until today, have not tried to respond to the petition made in the document "A Step Toward Democracy: Free Elections". All this election process was born with defects, continual injustice and, in conclusion, will be nul and false. COSEP launched from this podium a challenge inspired in the search of National Unity, ripened with prudence and filled with consciousness. It challenges the politicians and the true democratic parties in order to demand that from now on all these defective election processes, be immediately frozen, that it be postponed for another time in which it can be attained with precedence and under conditions of true equality of opportunities for all, within the spirit of the document: "A Step Toward Democracy: Free Elections". Only this way can the politicians remove themselves from the trap which has been set for them to act as "zancudos" and thus, also, avoid the condemning trials of history and of their consciences. We challenge the politicians and political parties to accompany us in our cry: Enough!

With this same spirit of National Unity, with the same prudence and consciousness, COSEP also challenges the Government of National Reconstruction to promote the necessary dialogue of reconciliation, that basing it on the document: "A Step Toward Democracy: Free Elections", conducts all of us to the democratization and the pacification of Nicaragua. National Unity yes, but with sincerity. Besides all the problems which we are actually going through in Nicaragua—and for mine personally, brought about by my unfailing posture in favor of COSEP, problems which will strangely multiply after this speech—it has not occurred to me to abandon my fight nor much less look for a new home outside my frontiers. Nicaragua has been good to me (and I believe with everyone also) and I have a lot to be grateful for.

I wish to make it clear before this Assembly, before Nicaraguans and the whole world, that I do not wish any position nor change, that I do not aspire for any candidacy nor do I accept any office, that I am not looking for flattery nor will I ever be a "Zancudo" of anything nor of anybody. After having traveled through the countryside, as my work demands, listening to the thought and feelings expressed by thousands of Nicaraguan, I feel I am authorized to tell you all that upon speaking out this morning, I do it not only in the name of the organized private sector INDE-COSEP, but also in name of all those who do not have a voice but who wish to be heard; in the name of the big, medium and small businessmen who do have rights, but who want to be listened to; in the name of those near and far who have no place to expose their claims.

That is why you, small store owner, market vendor, small land owner; you industrialist, store owner, big or small farmer or cattleman, this morning you to are speaking through me.

That is why you, Ismael, Frank Bendaña, Carlos Zeledón, Isidro León York, Ramiro Gurdián, Benjamín Lanzas, Arges Sequeira, Gregorio Iglesias de López, Uriel Rodríguez Sarria and hundred from an unending list of unjust confiscations, all of you are also speaking through me.

That is why you—Enrique, Benjamín y Gilberto—unjustly jailed, are also speaking this morning through me.

That is why you, Jorge Salazar, from your silent tomb and in the presence of God, God who inspires and guides our conscience, that is why you, Jorge, also speak this morning through me and shout to one and all: Enough Incitation Towards Hatred and Denial of God! Enough Slavery and Totalitarianism! Enough Indoctrination of Our Children! Enough!

WESTWAY: AN EXPENSIVE MISTAKE

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of the House a project under consideration that will greatly affect the city of New York.

The Westway project on the Hudson River is planned to be a 4.2-mile highway on a huge landfill adjacent to Manhattan. It has been touted as a valuable addition to the waterfront economy—a supposedly vital development that will benefit the neighborhoods of the area.

Unfortunately, the project is in reality a white elephant. There are three resons for this: its cost, its impact on the environment, and its impact on waterfront communities.

It will cost an estimated $2 to $4 billion, a huge amount when one considers that this is only an initial estimate. It could cost more. We in New York need funds for the improvement of the existing mass transit system. This would greatly benefit New York—to a much greater extent than Westway ever could.

The huge landfill needed for Westway would require dredging a large area of the Hudson. This could cause an environmental catastrophy by destroying a habitat of the striped bass, a species that is now suffering from over fishing and overdevelopment. A pending enviornmental impact study has not begun, and it is inconceivable that it should be delayed for this important habitat.

Last, Mr. Speaker, the economic strength of the waterfront communities will in all probability be marginally improved by Westway. The west side is in a period of growth, despite the proposed project. If anything, construction over a period of years may hinder this growth.

I hope that this House will keep in mind the implications of this wasteful project. The money could be spent in much more useful programs.●

FELLOWSHIP PROGRAM FOR THE BLIND AND DEAF

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a resolution that I hope will garner the widespread support it deserves. My bill, House Resolution 540, would establish a congressional fellowship program for the blind and deaf.

I am very much committed to this program, and if you have ever spoken with your blind and deaf constituents about opportunities on Capitol Hill you will understand my enthusiasm. It seems that not many offices up here are eager to give these men and women a chance to prove their abilities. Concurrently, not many of these men and women seem to consider employment on Capitol Hill a viable career option. I am convinced that both parties are unnecessarily missing out on some very valuable experiences.

That is why I have introduced House Resolution 540. We need to ensure that all of our citizens have the opportunity to be closely associated with the workings of Congress and that we, as Members of Congress, appreciate the abilities and perceptions of all our constituents.

Let me stress that House Resolution 540 only provides for a 2-year pilot program. At the end of that period, the House Administration Committee will evaluate it and issue recommendations as to the advisability of continuing. The experiences of the fellows will weigh heavily in the evaluation. If the program does not accomplish what I believe it can, I will be the first to admit it should be terminated. However, if the fellowships are properly chosen and administered, I don't see how the program can miss.

I hope you will join me in consponsoring House Resolution 540. There is a wealth of talent out there that we cannot afford to ovelook.

For more detailed information on House Resolution 540's provisions, a section-by-section analysis follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF HOUSE RESOLUTION 540

SECTION 1

Establishes a pilot program of Congressional fellowships for the blind and deaf, and sets out the purpose of the program.

There will be 100 positions available each year for two years. Each Member, Committee or Subcommittee may fill one position on a first come, first served basis, and are instructed to consider the qualifications of the fellow in assigning the position.

SECTION 2

Requires that participants be blind or deaf, can only serve for one session of Congress, will be paid $20,000 per year and, for administrative purposes, be treated in the same manner as an LBJ intern.

SECTION 3

Establishes that the program will be funded through the contingent fund of the House.

SECTION 4

Establishes that the positions and salaries provided under this resolution are in addition to positions and amounts othewise available.

SECTION 5

Directs the Committee on House Administration to evaluate and report to the House on the effectiveness of the program and whether it should continue.

SECTION 6

Defines "blind" and "deaf."

SECTION 7

Gives the Committee on House Administration the authority to prescribe regulations to carry out the resolution.●

THE SECRETARY SAYS LET'S STOP TERRORISM

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State is ready to do more to stop terrorism. He is to be commended for his energetic efforts in this regard and his tough words calling for a program to put an end to this international scourge.

In a recent speech in Washington before the Tel Aviv-based Jonathan Institute, Secretary of State Shultz noted that terrorism was on the increase all around the world. The rapid spread of state-sponsored terrorism is of special concern to Western democracies. The cutthroat members of the "League of Terror" are exporting indiscriminate murder across national borders to gain their objectives.

The Secretary pointed out that the President's legislative package on counterterrorism will be a positive step in our battle against this growing threat. We must also protect our diplomats and facilities overseas with better security and protection against attacks.

In addition, international cooperation with our allies is necessary in our struggle to end this problem. The recent declaration concerning terrorism at the London Economic Summit was a good sign that the countries that are targets and potential targets of terrorists are marching together toward a resolution of the problem. It is also possible to bring political and economic pressure to bear on states that boldly support international terrorism.

Our Government must also take a more active defense against terrorists. Although this new approach will have to be carefully studied, a purely passive defense fails to provide enough of a deterrent to terrorism and the countries which sponsor it. The terrorist must be put on notice that swift measures will be taken against those who engage in it. Intelligence is a key factor in this more active defense strategy. With unity, determination, and resolve, the free nations of the world can do something about this growing international threat to law and order.

I stongly recommend that my colleagues read the following sections from the Secretary's speech at the Jonathan Institute in Washington.

TERRORISM: THE CHALLENGE TO THE DEMOCRACIES

(Address by Hon. George P. Shultz, Secretary of State, to the Jonathan Institute)

Five years have passed since the Jonathan Institute held its first conference on terrorism, and in that time the world has seen two major developments: one a cause for great distress; the other a reason for hope.

The distressing fact is that over these past 5 years terrorism has increased. More people were killed or injured by international terrorists last year than in any year since governments began keeping records, In 1983 there were more than 500 such attacks, of which more than 200 were against the United States. For Americans the worst tragedies were the destruction of our Embassy and then the Marine barracks in Beirut. But around the world, many of our close friends and allies were also victims. The bombing of Harrods in London, the bombing at Orly Airport in Paris, the destruction of a Gulf Air flight in the UAE, and the Rangoon bombing of South Korean officials are just a few examples—not to mention the brutal attack on a West Jerusalem shopping mall this past April.

THE ANATOMY OF TERRORISM

What we have learned about terrorism, first of all, is that it is not random, undirected, purposeless violence. It is not, like an earthquake or a hurricane, an act of nature before which we are helpless. Terrorists and those who support them have definite goals; terrorist violence is the means of attaining those goals. Our response must be twofold: We must deny them the means, but above all we must deny them their goals.

But what are the goals of terrorism? We know that the phenomenon of terrorism is actually a matrix that covers a diverse array of methods, resources, instruments, and immediate aims.

It appears in many shapes and sizes—from the lone individual who plants a homemade expolsive in a shopping center, to the small clandestine group that plans kidnapings and assassinations of public figures, to the well-equipped and well-financed organization that uses force to terrorize an entire population. Its stated objectives may range from separatist causes to revenge for ethnic grievances to social and political revolution. International drug smugglers use terrorism to blackmail and intimidate government officials. It is clear that our responses will have to fit the precise character and circumstances of the specific threats.

But we must understand that the overarching goal of all terrorists is the same: With rare exceptions, they are attempting to impose their will by force—a special kind of force desinged to create an atmosphere of fear. And their efforts are directed at destroying what all of us here are seeking to build.

THE THREAT TO THE DEMOCRACIES

The United States and its democratic allies are morally committed to certain ideals and to a humane vision of the future. In our foreign policies, we try to foster the kind of world that promotes peaceful settlement of disputes, one that welcomes change without violent conflict.

We seek a world in which human rights are respected by all governments, a world based on the rule of law. We know that in a world community where all nations share these blessings, our own democracy will flourish, our own nation will prosper, and our own people will continue to enjoy freedom.

Nor has ours been a fruitless search. In our lifetime, we have seen the world progress, though perhaps too slowly, toward this goal. Civilized norms of conduct have evolved, even governing relations between adversaries. Conflict persists, but with some notorious exceptions, even wars have been conducted within certain restraints: Indiscriminate slaughter of innocents is widely condemned; the use of certain kinds of weapons has been proscribed, and most nations have heeded those proscriptions.

For we must understand, above all, that terrorism is a form of political violence. Wherever it takes place, it is directed in an important sense against us, the democracies—against our most basic values and often our fundamental strategic interests.

The values upon which democracy is based—individual rights, equality under the law, freedom of thought and expression, and freedom of religion—all stand in the way of those who seek to impose their ideologies or their religious beliefs by force. A terrorist has no patience and no respect for the orderly processes of democratic society and, therefore, he considers himself its enemy.

And it is an unfortunate irony that the very qualities that make democracies so hateful to the terrorists also make them so vulnerable. Precisely because we maintain the most open societies, terrorists have unparalleled opportunity to strike against us.

A COUNTERSTRATEGY AGAINST TERRORISM

Having identified the challenge, we must now consider the best strategy to counter it. We must keep in mind, as we devise our strategy, that our ultimate aim is to preserve what the terrorists seek to destroy: democracy, freedom, and the hope for a world at peace.

The battle against terrorism must begin at home. Terrorism has no place in our society, and we have taken vigorous steps to see that it is not imported from abroad. We are now working with the Congress on law-enforcement legislation that would help us obtain more information about terrorists through the payment of rewards to informants, and would permit prosecution of those who support states that use or sponsor terrorism. Our F.B.I. is improving our ability to detect and prevent terrorist acts within our own borders.

We must also ensure that our people and facilities in other countries are better protected against terrorist attacks. So we are strengthening security at our embassies around the world to prevent a recurrence of the Beirut and Kuwait Embassy bombings.

While we take these measures to protect our own citizens, we know that terrorism is an international problem that requires the concerted efforts of all free nations. Just as there is collaboration among those who engage in terrorism, so there must be cooperation among those who are its actual and potential targets.

An essential component of our strategy, therefore, has been greater cooperation among the democratic nations and all others who share our hopes for the future. The world community has achieved some successes. But too often, countries are inhibited by fear of losing commecial opportunities or fear of provoking the bully. The time has come for the nations that truly seek an end to terrorism to join together, in whatever forums, to take the necessary steps. The declaration on terrorism that was agreed upon at the London Economic Summit 2 weeks ago was a welcome sign that the industrial democracies share a common view of the terrorist threat. We must build on that foundation.

Greater international cooperation offers many advantages. If we can collectively improve our gathering and sharing of intelligence, we can better detect the movements of terrorists, anticipate their actions, and bring them to justice. We can also help provide training and share knowledge of terrorist tactics. To that end, the Reagan administration has acted promptly on the program that Congress approved last year to train foreign law enforcement officers in antiterrorist techniques. And the President has sent Congress two bills to implement two international conventions to which the United States is a signatory: the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, and the Montreal Convention to protect against sabotage of civilian aircraft.

We must also make a collective effort to address the special problem of state-sponsored terrorism. States that support terror offer safe havens, funds, training, and logistical support. We must do some hard thinking about how to pressure members of the League of Terror to cease their support. Such pressure will have to be international, for no one country can exert sufficient influence alone. Economic sanctions and other forms of pressure impose costs on the nation that applies them, but some sacrifices will be necessary if we are to solve the problem. In the long run, I believe, it will have been a small price to pay.

ACTIVE DEFENSE

All the measures I have described so far, domestic and international, are important elements in a comprehensive strategy. But are they enough? Is the purely passive defense that these measures entail sufficient to cope with the problem? Can we as a country—can the community of free nations—stand in a solely defensive posture and absorb the blows dealt by terrorists?

I think not. From a practical standpoint, a purely passive defense does not provide enough of a deterrent to terrorism and the states that sponsor it. It is time to think long, hard, and seriously about more active means of defense—about defense through appropriate preventive or pre-emptive actions against terrorist groups before they strike.

We will need to strengthen our capabilities in the area of intelligence and quick reaction. Human intelligence will be particularly important, since our societies demand that we know with reasonable clarity just what we are doing. Experience has taught us over the years that one of the best deterrents to terrorism is the certainty that swift and sure measures will be taken against those who engage in it. As President Reagan has stated:

"We must make it clear to any country that is tempted to use violence to undermine democratic governments, destabilize our friends, thwart efforts to promote democratic governments, or disrupt our lives, that it has nothing to gain, and much to lose."

Clearly there are complicated moral issues here. But there should be no doubt of the democracies' moral right, indeed duty, to defend themselves.

And there should be no doubt of the profound issue at stake. The democracies seek a world order that is based on justice. When innocents are victimized and the guilty go unpunished, the terrorists have succeeded in undermining the very foundation of civilized society, for they have created a world where there is no justice. This is a blow to our most fundamental moral values and a dark cloud over the future of humanity. We can do better than this.

No matter what strategy we pursue, the terrorist threat will not disappear overnight. This is not the last conference that will be held on this subject. We must understand this and be prepared to live with the fact that despite all our best efforts the world is still a dangerous place. Further sacrifices, as in the past, may be the price for preserving our freedom.●

JUDY ARCHIBALD—RECIPIENT OF THE CONGRESSIONAL PUBLIC SERVICE AWARD FOR REDWOOD CITY

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, the Congressional Public Service Award Advisory Committee for Redwood City has chosen an outstanding individual to receive the 1984 award for the community—Judy Archibald. I would like to share with my colleagues some of her distinguished accomplishments.

Judy Archibald has lived in Redwood City for 20 years and throughout that time has proved a dedicated and selfless community worker. She has been an active member of the Peninsula Hills Junior Womens Club, where she has held every elective office and has coordinated several fundraising projects: this year she organized the organization's anitique show and the antique show kitchen.

As chairperson of the first annual senior citizens Thanksgiving dinner she prepared and served a turkey dinner for 40 seniors who otherwise would have spent the holiday alone. She has also been cochairperson of the Redwood City Labor Day Community Breakfast Volunteers, and in November organized the fundraising dinner for Redwood City residents.

She was producer and director of the Miss Redwood City Pageant, in addition to supplying all the costumes and making her home available for functions for the participants. Judy has also put in many hours of volunteer time with the Danger Stranger Program in local schools which teaches children to be aware of the dangers of child abuse and personal safety.

Judy is a well-known, well-respected and loved member of our community. She has involved herself in a wide variety of community projects—so numerous, in fact, that it would be impossible to mention them all.●

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, in May of this year, the American College of Obstetricians & Gynecologists elected Dr. Luella Klein, known affectionately by her friends and colleagues as Teddy, as the first woman president in the history of that organization.

A private practitioner at Emory University Clinic, Atlanta, Dr. Klein is deputy chief of the obstetric service at Grady Memorial Hospital and professor of obstetrics and gynecology at Emory University School of Medicine. She is also codirector of the Regional Perinatal Center of Atlanta. Dr. Klein is board-certified subspecialist in maternal-fetal medicine.

At Grady Memorial Hospital, Dr. Klein is director of both the High Risk Maternal and Infant Care Project and the Teen Services Clinic. She was a prominent member of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists' Task Force on Adolescent Pregnancy (1979–81) and is the college's representative to the American Academy of Pediatrics' Committee on Adolescence (1979–present). She was vice president of the college from 1982 to 1983 and a member of the Task Force for the Advancement of Women in Obstetrics and Gynecology (1981–82).

Dr. Klein is currently an examiner for the American Board of Obstetrics and Gynecology and chairman of the maternal and infant health committee of the Medical Association of Georgia. In addition, she is past president of the Georgia Obstetrical and Gynecological Society, the Atlanta Women Physicians' Association, the Atlanta Obstetrical & Gynecological Society, and the Maternal & Infant Care Project Physicians' Association.

Since 1970, Dr. Klein has been a consultant to the Maternal and Child Health Service Studies on Rh Sensitization at Abortion in Yugoslavia. She is also author of numerous articles on various subjects in the specialty.

Formerly chairman of the Medical Advisory Committee for Planned Parenthood of Atlanta, Dr. Klein has also served on the Primary Care Task Force of the North Central Georgia Health Systems Agency and the Governor's Council on Family Planning.

Dr. Klein is a graduate of the University of Iowa College and received here M.D. degree from the State University of Iowa College of Medicine. After internship and residency training at Western Reserve University in Cleveland, OH, she was a U.S. Senior Fulbright Research Scholar in obstetrics and gynecology at University of London (England) Colquitt, Jr., M.D., Marietta, GA.

Both Dr. Klein and Dr. Colquitt are dedicated physicians and close friends of mine. I want to congratulate Teddy on her election and wish her the best for the coming year. I know that because of her professionalism and leadership ability, her tenure will be successful.●

SOME GOOD ADVICE FROM THE PEOPLE OF THE FOURTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY

HON. GENE SNYDER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, over the years we have heard about or actually experienced just about every kind of shortage imaginable—job shortages, oil shortages, railroad car shortages, and money shortages. However, there is one thing we do not ever have to worry about running short of here on Capitol Hill, and that is advice.

We have hordes of so-called experts with their computer readouts. We have specialists with their volumes of statistics. We have organizations and study groups and public interests groups. We have dozens of executive branch agencies and the folks over at the White House. And every one of them is eager to give us some advice.

And, of course, even Members of Congress occasionally offer their advice to one another as evidenced by the stacks of Dear Colleague letters in my inbasket every day, and the 10,013 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD pages this body has already managed to fill this year with sage comments, debate, and extended remarks.

No, Mr. Speaker, we do not need to worry much about a shortage of advice. We have it aplenty. Fortunately, much of the advice we receive from these sources is sound, but in this flood of advice, it is always difficult to tell the sound from the unsound; the good advice from the bad.

That is why I always try to get as much advice as I can from the one source that has never failed me yet—never steered me wrong—the people of the Fourth Congressional District of Kentucky.

Their advice has always served me well. They are the real experts because they live and work under the regulations and the laws dreamed up here in Washington.

Earlier this year, I sent out my annual questionnaire and now I would like to share the results of that poll with my colleagues; 16,000 of my constituents took the time to respond and their opinions on some of the national issues we will be facing should be of interest to any of my colleagues who share my belief that whenever you can get reliable advice, you should take it.

Although we have no shortage of advice—and are not apt to in the near future—we cannot afford to ignore good advice when it comes along.

Questionnaire results follow:

BANNING THE LEGHOLD TRAP

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to once again state my strongest support for H.R. 1797—The sole purpose of this bill is to end our Nation's long and sad relationship with the steel jaw leghold trap. The determined efforts of a small group of elected representatives to advance this bill gives hope to those who have been involved for decades in the campaign to control what surely must be one of the most barbaric and cruel devices produced by man for the killing of animals.

When H.R. 1797 was first introduced in March of 1983, the steel jaw leghold trap was already 160 years old. In the years since its development in 1823, there have been few dramatic improvements in its tried-and-true operation. When the trap is set, any pressure on the triggering device or "pan" springs loose the steel jaws which slam shut with certainty. Devoid of any discrimination, the trap has rightfully earned a reputation for painfully imprisoning anything or anybody that hits the "pan."

VOICES FROM THE PAST

Consideration of eliminating use of the steel jaw trap is far from new. Nineteenth century naturalist Charles Darwin—who figured largely in redefining man's knowledge of biology—wrote in 1863: "I know of no sight more sorrowful than that of these unoffending animals as they are seen in the torture grip of these traps."

Canadian trapper Frank Conibear, who became a legendary figure in the vast western regions of his country, spent 32 years maintaining trap lines. One day, he renounced his primary trapping tool, the steel jaw leghold trap, writing:

> It is sometimes said that wildlife is cruel, and that the animals die a painful death anyway, by the teeth and claws of predators. But the sufferings occasioned by the common steel trap are incomparably greater.

And so now we consider whether this Nation should make a definitive statement against the slow and desperate agony produced by this type of trap. While Congress will be confronted with mountains of statistics and expert testimony, I believe it essential that several fundamental questions be considered in deciding the fate of H.R. 1797.

THE REAL ISSUES

First, Does the steel jaw leghold trap strike blindly and indiscriminately?

Yes. Despite protestations that trappers know their terrain and their quarry, each year millions of the "wrong" animals have their limbs smashed by the steel jaw trap. There is no margin for error. The trap does not distinguish "right" game from wrong. Pet dogs, cats, endangered species including American eagles, unwanted animals known as "trash" by the trappers—all have fallen victim to a brutal device that cannot discriminate, but cripples all the same. In one 2-year period, veterinarian surveys in Minnesota produced 360 cases of pets being seriously injured in traps.

Second, since trapping is identified as important to our Nation's fur industry, are there more humane ways of trapping animals than use of the steel jaw leghold trap?

Yes, The Swedish leg-snare, the easy-on-em leg-snare, the Aldrich leg-snare, the Victor power snare, the Novak leg-snare, box and cage traps, even a sure-death device produced initially by Frank Conibear. These devices exist today. They substantially address the painful agony associated with the steel jaw trap.

While these traps snare animals and hold them in a more humane fashion than the steel jaw trap, it still falls to the trapper to responsibly check his trap frequently. It is when trappers are irresponsible that the pain and suffering of trapped-animals is dramatically increased.

Third, will the Congress establish a precedent by seeking to ban the use of the steel jaw trap?

No. If anything, this country is slow to join the more than 50 nations of the world who have alreday taken action to eliminate the steel jaw trap. Nations as diverse as England, West Germany, Malaysia, and Brazil.

Several States have already acted to control the steel-jaw trap. Florida, Massachusetts, and my State of California are just three who have taken various steps to control the use of this device.

Also, a survey by the Yale School of Forestry published in 1979, funded by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, showed that 78 percent of all those questioned felt the use of steel jaw traps is wrong.

Finally, there are those who say that our Nation has a "special, enduring relationship" with the steel jaw trap. Does such a relationship exist between our Nation and a mechanism that kills animals in a slow, agonizing fashion in the name of profit or sport?

I pray not.

A VALID COMPARISON

Those who strongly support trapping have often utilized arguments based on economics and wildlife management to protect their special interest in the steel-jaw trap. They speak of lost jobs, lost income, devastated industries, and serious wildlife management problems if the trap is banned.

They do not, however, discuss the record of Nations who have acted to bar the leghold trap. Such records provide a comparison I find reasonable and enlightening.

The Federal Republic of Germany shares many characteristics with the Northeast United States. Similar population densities, use of the land, climate, even similar furbearing animal species are found in the two different areas. West Germany banned the steel-jaw leghold trap in 1961.

Eighteen years after the ban was enacted, the Minister for Food, Agriculture, and Forestry stated that there had been no serious consequences for game management, economic considerations, or health concerns as a result of the ban. That same year, West Germany * * * without benefit of the steel-jaw trap * * * exported almost $5 million worth of furs to the United States, fully one-quarter of our Nation's fur imports in 1979.

The West German example is valid. It clearly refutes many of the tenuous arguments advanced by the steel-jaw trap advocates. When the leghold trap was banned in West Germany, industry did not collapse, rabies did not break-out in epidemic proportions, timbered regions were not carted off wholesale by beavers, and raccoons did not trample fields of corn. In fact, the Forestry Minister praised the leghold ban in Germany as having a "good effect on the natural ecosystem".

I have saved one final consideration. I have so far referred solely to the suffering endured by animals from the leghold trap. But as a final reminder of the indiscriminate nature of this unseeing, uncaring mechanism, I remind my colleagues that anything or anybody can trigger these traps. I offer the following passage from a letter to the Journal of the American Medical Association by Dr. John F. Beary of the Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, MD:

"I recently treated a 4-year-old * * * girl who was caught by her right hand in a steel jaw trap that had been set by an unknown person in a small woods behind her home * * *. The prognosis for a complete recovery of fine motor skills is doubtful."

The power of the steel-jaw leghold trap is devastating. It cannot discern between the front paw of a coyote, the hind leg of a German Shepard, or the right hand of a little girl. It clings to its victims with deadly certainty, prompting many animals to gnaw their own limbs off in an effort to escape.

It is time to put the tools of the early 19th century behind us.

It is time to ban the steel-jaw leghold trap.●

West Genesee High School has a tradition of excellence in lacrosse. The Wildcats have won three New York State championships and numerous sectional titles.

Congratulations are in order for Coach Messere and Principal Clyde Ohl for providing exemplary leadership as well as a strong scholastic environment that helped the Wildcats reach the top of their form.

The Wildcats are known for their team spirit and dedication to the game. Every one of the team members deserves special recognition for a job well done. The lessons they learned on the lacrosse field will serve them well in the years to come.●

THE WHITE HOUSE PAPER ON POPULATION CONTROL

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, great turmoil has followed since the existence and contents of a White House position paper on population control has come to light. Much of the focus has rightly been on the differences between the White House paper and responses from two agencies primarily concerned with international population policy and disbursement of funds: the State Department and the Agency for International Development.

These differences come from arguments that State and AID have been truer to the wishes of the American people and administration policy than the views reflected in the White House paper. Two population-related issues have been raised specifically. First, shall the U.S. Government bankroll international agencies who pass funds to foreign governments engaged in coercive population control programs, such as the UNFPA? Second, what is the correct U.S. position regarding population control in its foreign policy?

Many thoughtful Americans believe the first problem is easily settled. Since the U.S. Government is forbidden from funding coercive population control methods within our borders, our policy must also assure that abortion, forced sterilization, and other onerous violations of the embattled human right to life are not funded overseas. The State Department and AID have been forbidden directly to fund coercive programs bilaterally by law. What is unclear to AID and State policymakers is whether U.S. policy is also prevented from assisting in these violations of human rights when funded multilaterally.

State and AID take the view that international commitments to multilateral organizations lock the United States into continued funding. While there is some talk that U.S. funds might be segregated from the general funds administered by organizations such as UNFPA, State and AID are currently unprepared to go any further. It is for this reason they strongly oppose the White House position paper, prepared for delivery to an international population conference to be held in August in Mexico City.

Mr. Speaker, I would call the attention of my colleagues to the second issue raised by this controversy. Simply put: How do we view population increases in less developed countries? Is increased population a barrier to economic growth and political pluralism in few cases, some cases, many cases, all cases? A review of AID's programs in poorer countries reveals the answer. The United States is strongly committed to the view that increased population is one of the major "problems" to be overcome by host governments in order to successfully "develop." By emphasizing population programs in missions, bureaus, and AID/Washington, Mr. Speaker, AID reminds me of a comment I made at the conclusion of my membership on the Commission on Security and Economic Assistance. At that time I commented that so long as we see only hungry mouths and overlook willing hands, our international population program will be counterproductive.

When the U.S. Government overseas enters into a partnership with a host government to get their population growth rates under control, the likely result is to encourage governments of less developed countries to use coercive methods. Here is why. In spite of the fact that bilateral population assistance cannot be used directly to fund coercive programs, by defining growth rates as a problem to be solved by governments, resources are diverted that might otherwise be used to pursue growth-related economic policies. There is a natural temptation in countries with ethnic and political diversity to target population control programs against "problem elements" who oppose the usual one-party Third World regime structure.

How much better off would the United States be, Mr. Speaker, to forbid assistance to multilateral organizations allowing developing countries to push coercive population control methods on the hapless populace? President Reagan has already shown outstanding leadership on funding of UNESCO press control activities—isn't it time to send a similar signal to UNFPA and others? Just as thought control has no place in the American ethic—particularly in 1984—coercive population control methods have no place either.

Is it so unthinkable to suggest that instead of encouraging the State Department and AID to devote millions of dollars and hundreds of employees to population programs in recipient countries, however benign such bilateral programs might seem, wouldn't the United States be better off diverting these scarce resources to obtaining economic and political policy changes that would encourage democratic free enterprise to flourish?

Once again, Mr. Speaker, recent polling data confirms the opposition of the average American to foreign aid. Certainly no overseas program committed to ideals outside of our own laws can earn the support of our citizens. U.S. Government policy must be guided by statements such as those contained in the White House paper for delivery in Mexico City. I can understand how many in the bureaucracy and some special interest groups might be offended by the statement, but I find it moderate and reasonable. Furthermore, by supporting this kind of statement and tailoring America's overseas presence to it, the United States will find itself able to be more consistent in dealing with developing countries.

Our emphasis, after all, should be on proven methods to broaden opportunities for citizens through productive free enterprise. Evidence has shown that in growth-oriented countries which have growing middle classes, the so-called population crisis evaporates.●

SAKHAROV—JOINT RESOLUTION

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, 7 weeks ago Andrei Sakharov, the only Soviet ever to win the Nobel Peace Prize, launched an open-ended hunger strike to secure medical care for his wife, Yelena Bonner. News of that hunger strike generated great and immediate concern throughout the world, particularly among those signatory states that have joined the Soviet Union in human rights accords. In concert with other Members of Congress, I engaged in a very frank exchange of views with officials at the Soviet Embassy. My visits to the Soviet Union and meetings with Mrs. Bonner's son, Alexey Semyonov, confirm my own view that this is not an internal Soviet affair, and I joined others in sharing this conviction with leaders at home and abroad.

But despite repeated assurances by the Soviet Government and press, we have yet to obtain proof that Dr. Sakharov and his wife are alive and well. Recent reports of the couple's safety, complete with leaked photographs, only deepen the mystery. We know Dr. Sakharov and his wife are in poor health and cannot survive without proper medical treatment, and we cannot be expected to believe otherwise until Soviet authorities provide tangible evidence that this is not the case.

I urge the President and Department of State to contact their appropriate counterparts in the Soviet Government and call upn them, on behalf of this body, to verify the health and well-being of Andrei Sakharov and Yelena Bonner. We will not rest until the fate of this courageous couple is known.●

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE NEW PRESIDENT OF PANAMA

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I salute President-elect Barletta and his great country. The flame of democracy burns brightly in that lovely Latin American land. This open and free electoral process was allowed to work.

Just a few weeks ago, President Nicolas Ardito-Barletta was elected by the freedom-loving people of Panama. The elections were significant for many reasons. They were held in a free and open way. They marked the return to a civilian president after 16 years of rule by the Panamanian Defense Forces. The military is to be commended for their farsighted efforts to relinquish power. They played a key role in passing the reins of power to a popularly elected president, and smoothed the way to a peaceful transition to civilian rule.

President-elect Barletta brings experience and substance to the presidency of that important country. He served as an economist at the World Bank, and was instrumental in formulating a new strategy for economic development in Latin America.

I am certain that my colleagues will join me in congratulating President-elect Barletta. I wish him well in his endeavors.

My colleagues and I look forward to working with President-elect Barletta to strenghten the bonds between our two nations.●

HON. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to inform my colleagues that the Committee on Ways and Means today reported to the House H.R. 5953, to increase the statutory limit on the public debt.

I wish to serve notice, pursuant to the rules of the Democratic Caucus, that I have been instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to seek less than an open rule for the consideration of this bill by the House of Representatives.●

HISTORY DAY

HON. DANIEL B. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. DANIEL B. CRANE. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, this year, the National Endowment for the Humanities' National History Day involved some 150,000 secondary school students from over 40 States. This year's theme to be followed in the preparation of papers, projects, performances, and media presentations was "Family and Community in Media."

National History Day itself is the culmination of a series of contests held at the staff and district levels judged by hundreds of historians and educators. The research that students do for their projects, guided by their teachers, stimulates imagination and creativity as well as scholarship, reading, and writing skills.

Rob Gentry, a resident of Tuscola, IL, and a student at Tuscola High School, was one of those chosen from over 150,000 participants to compete at the National Finals of History Day at the University of Maryland on June 13 to 16 of this year. Rob's entry, which was completed with the help of teachers, Mr. Bill Hill and Mrs. Linda Hance of East Prairie School, was a paper entitled "The Amish: A Community at Home in Illinois." This paper is a fine example of the intelligence and potential which is found in the youth of this great country.

Congratulations, Rob, Mr. Hill, Mrs. Hance, and Tuscola High School. Keep up the good work. All of America is with you.●

REMEMBRANCE OF THE BATTLE OF KOSOVO

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, today, June 28, Americans of Serbian descent and Serbs all over the world commemorate a decisive date in all Balkan history. This date marks the 595th anniversary of the First Battle of Kosovo, in which a coalition of Serbs, Bosnians, Magyars, Vlachs, Bulgars, Albanians, and Poles under the Serbian Czar, Prince Lazar I, fought valiantly to defend their homeland against the onslaught of the Ottoman Turks. In this great battle, 25,000 troops from all of the Balkan peoples fought bravely but were overpowered by the troops of Murad I, the Turkish sultan.

The Turkish drive to conquer all of Europe began in the 1330's. By 1371, it began its campaign to conquer the Serbian state by defeating the Serbs at Maritsa River. The final battle in this conquest was fought in 1389 on the Plains of Kosovo. This battle marked the fall of the Serbs as an independent state. Both leaders, Prince Lazar of Serbia and the Turkish sultan, Murad I, were killed. Murad I was killed by the Serbian knight, or voyvode, Milosh Obilish, who has since been immortalized in songs and legends. Although this battle marked the fall of the Serbian state as an independent entity, it did not represent the subjugation of the indomitable spirit of the Serbian people. Memories of the battle and its significance as a symbol in the struggle for freedom were kept alive by the Serbian people in the Serbian Orthodox Church, which encouraged national spirit and pride throughout the years of Turkish domination.

This battle led to the complete domination of the Serbian people by 1459, when Serbia became part of the Ottoman Empire. The Turkish victory at Kosovo provided the Turks with a valuable base for later advances toward the Danube. The Ottoman Turks proved to be harsh rulers, subjecting their Serbian vassals to cruel and inhumane treatment. This torment continued until 1830, when the declining Ottoman Empire gave the Serbians the opportunity to regain their autonomy, and finally, their independence as a kingdom in 1882.

Following World War I, the Serbian royal dynasty led the way in the establishment of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croatians, and Slovenians, which became Yugoslavia 11 years later. In 1945, the monarchy was abolished when the Communists, under Joseph Tito, replaced the yoke of Nazi totalitarianism with that of Communist totalitarianism, and subsequently banned official observance of the Battle of Kosovo, in attempting to destroy the national pride represented by this symbol of struggle against oppression.

I cannot help but admire, Mr. Speaker, the courage of the Serbian people in their determination to prevail in the cause of freedom that is represented by the commemoration of the Battle of Kosovo. This dedication is embodied by the Americans of Serbian descent, such as Nikola Tesla, the great inventor, who have made lasting contributions to the United States. I join, with pride, Mr. Speaker, the Serbian-Americans who commemorate the Battle of Kosovo and its meaning to the cause of freedom. The dedication to patriotism and freedom that these great people show is inspiring to the entire world.●

OF MINNESOTA

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, printed below is a letter from the National Coal Association which states that it has taken no position in favor of the trade remedies bill, H.R. 4784. The coal association had been listed earlier as a supporter of that bill and has asked that its position be clarified. The letter is as follows:

NATIONAL COAL ASSOCIATION,
Washington, DC, June 28, 1984.

Mr. STONIE BARKER, Jr.,
Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, Island Creek Coal Co., 2355 Harrodsburg Road, Lexington, KY.

DEAR STONIE: In response to verbal inquiries, I would like to clarify the position of the National Coal Association regarding trade reform legislation.

The NCA Board of Directors decided in March 1984 to support legislation proposed by the Trade Reform Action Coalition (or "TRAC"). This legislation, S. 2139 and H.R. 4124, is viewed as being of benefit to the coal industry in two ways.

Several of the industries which are severely impacted by unfairly traded imports (like steel, textiles, etc.) are, or could be, significant domestic consumers of coal. Any output gains these industries may register due to reduced unfair foreign competition could result in increased domestic coal consumption.

These more effective trade laws would be available to the coal industry, or individual companies, should significant levels of subsidized and/or dumped foreign coal, or coke, begin to enter the United States to the harm of the coal industry.

I want to assure you, however, that NCA has not and will not take a position on H.R. 4784, Rep. Gibbons' (D.Fla.) the "Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984." We are not working in any way to effect passage of this proposal.

TRAC, an extremely large coalition of which NCA is but a relatively small member, is supporting the Gibbons bill. However, while we continue to support the TRAC legislation, we are unable to lend our support to the Gibbons bill since that legislation includes several provisions, including a natural resource subsidy provision, that are not part of the TRAC proposals and were not considered by the NCA Board of Directors. Therefore, while NCA's name was listed in the June 18, 1984 letter from the Ad Hoc Group Supporting Passage of H.R. 4784 as a member of the TRAC coalition (which we are), that does not mean that NCA itself is in support of H.R. 4784.

I hope this letter clears up any misconception there may have been as to NCA's position in the trade reform area, but please give me a call if you have any further questions.

Sincerely,

CARL E. BAGGE, President.●

BILL TO REQUIRE PHYSICIANS TO ADEQUATELY INFORM BREAST CANCER PATIENTS

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which has been overlooked and drastically needed for many years. Inroads have been made in the treatment of breast cancer. However, there are many more yet to be made. We, as legislators, have a responsibility to the women of this country to make them aware of the alternative efficacious methods of treatment that are medically viable for this dread disease. We also have a responsibility to these women that the physicians and surgeons treating them get their informed consent before proceeding with treatment. Upon enactment of this bill, breast cancer patients would be made aware of alternative efficacious methods of treatment which may be medically viable and her informed consent would be required before surgery is initiated. There would be no surprises to the woman when she comes out of the operating room. This bill will be a step toward giving a breast cancer patient compassionate respect and educating her as to the options available to her when she has to make a decision as to the determination of treatment of her disease.●

TRIBUTE TO GENE DICK, MANAGER, SOUTH OXNARD EMPLOYMENT DEVELOPMENT OFFICE

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, on June 30, 1984, Mr. Gene Dick will retire from the California State Employment Development Department after 22 years with that agency.

I believe that it is appropriate that I should bring this occasion to the attention of my colleagues. Gene Dick's contributions to the agency and the citizens of my district have been significant.

Gene has worked in all phases of EDD, having experience in both job service and unemployment insurance. He has worked both in staff and field office assignments. He was manager of the San Fernando office in 1968 and in 1969 was manager of the Pacoima Service Center. He has been in Oxnard since 1971 when he was transferred as manager of that office. At that time, no other field offices existed in Ventura County.

This last assignment as manager of the South Oxnard EED office puts him in charge of over 70 employees providing a full range of employment and unemployment insurance services.

Gene's personnel file is laden with letters of appreciation from both inside and outside of the department. His efforts on behalf of youth earned him recognition from the Ventura County Board of Supervisors in 1981 for his work on the Youth Advisory Council. In 1979, the Candelaria Native American Program recognized him for his efforts to establish a job placement program for Native Americans. This program continues today.

Within EDD, Gene has continuously served on task forces to improve the design and effectiveness of services to the public. In 1975, he served on the task force to redesign the job service program in California. In 1971, he served on the statewide task force called to measure the effectiveness of manpower programs.

Gene was born in Washington State but was raised in Pomona, CA. In high school he excelled in the pole vault and competed in State competitions. He joined the Navy in 1940 and went from apprentice seaman to warrant officer. He received the Purple Heart for wounds suffered during the attack on Pearl Harbor while stationed aboard the Oklahoma. He spent 10 years on submarine duty and because there was no M.D. aboard, he assumed the duties of hospital corpsman and was referred to as "Doc". At one point, Gene dove off the sub to rescue the executive officer who had been washed overboard.

From 1950 to 1951, he was stationed at the Navy Medical School in Bethesda, MD, and his last command was at the Fiscal and Supply Medical Service at Camp Pendleton from where he retired in 1962.

Gene and his wife Marge have four children. Marge is employed by the County of Ventura Public Social Services Agency. They have no definite retirement plans except to row through the Ventura Marina, read, and do some woodworking.●

KOREAN EXPO 84

HON. JERRY M. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of my colleagues to an important trade and cultural event which will be taking place at the Anaheim Convention Center on July 6, 7, 8, 1984. I am referring to Korea Expo '84. The sponsors of this event are to be commended for their efforts to introduce the American community to the unique attributes of the Korean culture and economy.

The Korea Expo presents the opportunity for exhibition of a wide range of new Korean products and services. In addition, Expo '84 will embody various demonstrations and examples of the unique Korean cultural experience. By sharing in our cultural experiences, and the enhanced understanding resulting from such exchanges, the United States and Korea can continue to build a more harmonious relationship. Korea Expo '84 exemplifies this commitment to improve our relations.

The people of the Republic of Korea and the people of the United States, most specifically California, historically share many common bonds created through cultural exchanges, trade, friendships, and shared ideals. Fully 300,000 of the 600,000 Koreans living in the United States reside in southern California. I am proud to have the honor as a Member of Congress, to represent such a fine community of responsible citizens.

Mr. Speaker, at this point let me personally thank a few members of the Korean community who have helped to make Korea Expo '84 possible. First and foremost the president and chairman of the Expo, Mr. Ho Y. Chung, and the rest of the board of directors and officers, Matthew Ahn, Keum Jai Baik, Greak Bang, David Hyun, Bond T. Kim, Dong S. Kim, Paul C. Kim, Tae W. Kim, Nicholas Lee, David Park, Jae Park, Young B. Shon, Tong S. Suhr, H. Henry Whang, Jay S. Yoo, Vincent Lee, Sunny H. Chung, Jennifer Chung, Johnny Yun, Linda S. Bae, Richard Chung, Du Bin Im, and Sai Kyu Kim.

It is with a great deal of pride that I hereby applaud and support Korea Expo '84. I wish the sponsors every success in this endeavor.●

TRIBUTE TO VENITA DICKERSON

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues the retirement of Venita Dickerson, a dynamic woman who lived life to the fullest and not regretted a moment.

In 1958, Venita was an attractive, energetic woman. She walked with a lively, ambitious step. It was the last of October the warmth of summer behind and the prospect of winter nipping the air. Venita had just finished playing in one of the final golf tournaments of the season at the Ann Arbor Golf Course. She headed for Detroit in her car where a sales assignment awaited her.

In a brief and instant twist of horror, Venita's car was hit from behind by another automobile. The fresh country air and a quick afternoon of golf were forever seized from her life. Her surroundings became the stark white and surgical steel of a hospital room. She was told that her spine had been crushed and she would never walk again. Where her body weakened, there remained, however, a matchless strength in her spirit.

Venita was born in Owensboro, KY, the youngest of 10 children. In 1940 she migrated to Ann Arbor. During World War II she was a foreman at the Willow Run Bomber Plant. With only a fourth grade education behind her, she progressively held a number of supervisory positions. At the age of 22, she was in charge of 127 employees in an electronics firm. She was a production supervisor at a firm producing precision parts. She was also employed by the King-Seeley Corp. of Ann Arbor.

Venita, for the past 24 years, has served as the president of CAP, Inc., a Scio Township firm located on Enterprise Drive, near Ann Arbor. It is a nonprofit organization, owned and operated by its employees. Its purpose is to maintain and operate a facility for the training and employment of people who because of mental, emotional, or physical handicaps have limited employment opportunities.

The days after Venita's accident were filled with time for despair and for worry. "I had a lot of time, too much time, to sit in a wheelchair and stare at the walls feeling sorry for myself," she remembers. She soon wearied of daytime television and house-cleaning. Her two grown sons were married and away from home. Her husband, George, operated a milk route. She began painting for a while, but soon longed for a more challenging activity.

The daughter of a sawmill owner, she grew up with stamina and courage. She refused to succumb to self-pity:

I got out a stack of telephone books and began looking for the names of small manufacturing plants. I had worked all my life from Kentucky to Texas. I couldn't just sit there and admit that my life was over. I didn't need the money as much as I needed to believe that I was useful.

Venita began doing odd jobs, painting, assembly, or packaging. Her husband set up a workroom in their garage. The workload soon grew. Venita enlisted the aid of a neighbor, a heart patient.

That was the beginning of CAP, Inc. The struggle was long and arduous. Venita sought the advice and help of occupational therapists, lawyers, businessmen, and community leaders. An organization meeting was held with about 125 people in attendance. With $195 in funds, Venita rented a frame shed-like structure and began pleading with manufacturers for more work. She had a continuous waiting list of employees, as many as 300 at one time.

The people who came to work with me were so happy to have something to do, that you'd cry just looking at them. They agreed to work for nothing at first until production could meet overhead and we could purchase the tools we needed.

She recalled.

Venita excelled as a businesswoman and a humanitarian. In 1964, she received the Lane Bryant Award for volunteer service to the community. In June 1967, she received an honorary degree, a trustee's citation at Olivet College.

The new firm quickly outgrew its first building, then three others in the first 4 years. CAP's present building on Enterprise Drive has over 23,000 square feet, the latest addition having been built in 1979.

For more than 20 years, Venita Dickerson has brought some hope to a segment of society very much in need of hope. Venita and CAP gave to Washtenaw County's physically, emotionally, and mentally disabled a sense of pride and self-worth. The evidence of CAP's success lies in the smiles on the faces of the workers.

"The transformation in people is miraculous," says Venita. "You should see them when they come in. They are down, carrying the world on their shoulders. Nobody wants them. After they work a couple of weeks and draw a salary, it does wonders for them. They can hold their heads up again."

The company name, CAP, comes from two words which preoccupied Venita during the first years after her accident, the last three letters of "handicap" and the first three letters of "capable."

"I have to believe I was handicapped for a reason. That reason was to start CAP and bring some hope into a lot of lives that needed it."

What Venita gave these lives was simply a helping hand and a chance to just do what everybody else does. That helping hand and that chance gave something very precious to everyone, the freedom to live a normal life.

If the accident hadn't happened, I might still be out playing golf, but just think of all the experiences and great people I might have missed knowing. God has certainly walked with his hand on my shoulder.

Venita Dickerson, after 24 years at the helm of CAP, Inc., has recently retired. Her organization continues and will be merged with the Work Skills Corp, in Brighton, a similar sheltered workshop.

The story of Venita's determination and perseverance in the face of such adversity will most certainly be remembered for a long time to come. She truly embodies the American spirit and her gift of hope will live on in the lives of all she has touched and helped over these past 24 years.●

A SENSE OF THE CONGRESS RESOLUTION COMMEMORATING THE SENIOR COMPANION PROGRAM UPON THE CELEBRATION OF ITS 10TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Chairman, today I have introduced a sense of the Congress resolution along with 98 original cosponsors, to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the senior companion program. Senator JOHN HEINZ, the respected chairman of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, has introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 124, and identical resolution in the Senate and together it is our intention to honor the tireless efforts of the seniors who participate in the senior companion program.

The senior companion program is one of the three older American volunteer programs administered by the ACTION Agency. Senior companions are low-income persons 60 years of age or older who utilize their life experiences, wisdom, and skills, in providing friendship and care in daily living to the frail, isolated elderly, particularly those at risk of institutionalization.

The companions are assigned to home bound, hospice care, acute care, mental health, and substance abuse components of their local projects. All assignments are aimed at helping others live as fully and as independently as possible. Senior companions provide 20 hours of service per week, for which they receive a stipend of $2 an hour. There are currently 76 ACTION funded projects and 9 senior companion programs totally supported by non-Federal funded resources across the Nation. They currently have 5,000 volunteers who reach nearly 20,000 elderly in need of care annually.

The senior companion program fosters the independence and enhances the self-esteem of senior companion volunteers themselves, while meeting a critical community need of care for the frail elderly. Over the past 10 years senior companions are credited with enabling older persons at risk of institutionalization to remain in the more satisfying setting of their own homes.

This sense of the Congress resolution recognizes the tremendous accomplishment of volunteers serving in this valuable program. As chairman of the Select Committe on Aging, I am honored to be able to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the older Americans who partcipate in this most meaningful program. And, I am certain my colleagues will agree that the success the senior companion program is a tribute to the caring spirit of all Americans.

The text of the resolution follows:

H. CON. RES. —

Expressing the sense of the Congress that the Senior Companion Program be commended on its 10th anniversary for its success in providing volunteer opportunities for older Americans

Whereas the 10th anniversary of the Senior Companion Program, one of the Older American Volunteer Programs administered by the ACTION Agency, will be observed during 1984;

Whereas older American volunteers constitute a major untapped resource for addressing community needs;

Whereas the Senior Companion Program provides a volunteer peer support system, with a stipend for each volunteer, utilizing the experiences, wisdom, and skills of low-income persons over the age of 60 in providing personal services and friendship to the frail, isolated elderly;

Whereas the Senior Companion Program provides opportunities for older Americans to be involved as responsible, knowledgeable members of their communities while remaining independent, self-confident, and productive well into their own later years; and

Whereas the Senior Companion Program enables the frail elderly at risk of institutionalization to be cared for in the more satifactory independent living setting of their own homes, resulting in substantial financial savings to individuals and taxpayer-financed health care provision programs: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Senior Companion Program is commended on its 10th anniversary for its success in providing volunteer opportunities for older Americans to utilize their experience and abilities as caregivers to the frail elderly in their communities.●

QUALITY DRINKING WATER: URGENT ENVIRONMENTAL AND HEALTH PROBLEM

HON. DENNIS E. ECKART

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ECKART. Mr. Speaker, it has become increasingly apparent that the quality of our Nation's drinking water sources, particularly those sources supplied by underground acquifers is one of the most urgent environmental and health problems facing us today. I believe that the issue is so critical that, if we are fortunate, it will only be the environmental issue of the decade; if we fail, groundwater contamination and contaminated drinking water supplies will be the environmental issue of the century.

Consider the growing examples of groundwater contamination—

In one EPA study, 29 percent of the larger cities supplied by underground sources of drinking water were found to have at least one volatile organic chemical in their water.

EPA's own statistics show that in fiscal year 1980—the last year for which data were available—there were 146,000 violations of drinking water standards or monitoring requirements and the required public notification was only given in 16,000 cases.

A Cornell University study which EPA has refused to release officially showed that nearly one-sixth of public water systems violated even the most basic of water treatment requirements—that water be disinfected to destroy disease-carrying pathogens. The report estimated that a half-million rural homes might have bacterial levels in their drinking water greater than levels permitted for public beaches.

There are over 181,000 surface impoundments in the country used for the storage of industrial, municipal and other wastes. Even though their contents may be hazardous, most of them are unlined. It has been estimated that two-thirds lie within 1 mile of a source of drinking water.

A recent National Academy of Sciences study found ground water contamination from chemical sources in 34 States.

Unfortunately, EPA is not up to the task of ensuring that drinking water supplies in this country are kept safe for human consumption. EPA promulgated interim drinking water standards in 1975, after the passage of the Safe Drinking Water Act of 1974, but has yet to revise these standards into final form. EPA has issued these interim standards for fewer than two dozen substances during the last 10 years, and even the interim standards are based largely on the 1962 Public Health Service recommendations and technology that was generally available in 1974.

Because of this slipshod performance, I introduced the Safe Drinking Water Act of 1983 last June with Mr. WAXMAN. Our Subcommittee on Health and the Environment heard 5 days of hearings and took testimony from 30 witnesses. I have held numerous meetings during the past year with leaders of the environmental community, officials of the public and private water systems, and members of affected industries.

I have been impressed repeatedly by the crying need to pass legislation in this area; we must bring our drinking water protections into the decade of the 1980's. Building upon the weeks of hearings and subsequent public and private discussions with all sides, my colleague, Mr. MADIGAN and I are introducing legislation to reauthorize the Safe Drinking Water Act of 1974.

This is truly a bill which deserves broad bipartisan support. Each of the affected groups—environmentalists, the water treatment industry, and other industries—has argued that the act should be reauthorized and amended. Our present law is ineffective in guaranteeing potable water supplies for our people. Accordingly, we are introducing a bill which will push EPA to do its job, provide help to the small water systems that need it so much, and promote efforts by States to plan for the protection of underground sources of drinking water.

The legislation Mr. MADIGAN and I are introducing will—

Force EPA to decide to regulate 14 of the most serious volatile organic compounds within 18 months and 50 additional contaminants within 3 years.

Require every water system in the country to monitor for yet-unregulated contaminants because in this case it is clear that what we don't know can hurt us.

Ban the injection of hazardous wastes above or into underground drinking water sources.

Provide criminal penalties for anyone who tampers with public water supplies.

Establishes a requirement that the States develop plans to protect underground sources of drinking water. These plans must be developed within 2½ years and must include identification of underground drinking water sources to be protected and sources of contamination, contain implementing regulations which the State will use to enforce its plan, provide for alternative drinking water supplies if needed, and for any State in which oil or natural gas exploration occurs, the State plan must provide for the protection of underground sources of drinking water from brine contamination.

States which fail to have plans approved lose their primacy authority under the underground injection program and are also subject to citizen suits.

Each State is eligible to receive Federal grants for 50 percent of the costs of development and implementation of the approved plan, and 10 percent of the total funding is set aside for the special protection of sole source acquifer areas.

I am heartened by the many positive responses we have received from the water companies, industry groups, and from the comments we have received from environmental groups such as the National Wildlife Federation, Friends of the Earth, Natural Resources Defense Council, and the Environmental Policy Institute. I look forward to working out any additional concerns that other interested parties may have, and I am still pledged to continue to work out additional areas around which we have not yet been able to compromise, such as citizen suits of polluters.●

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO VERNICE LOHMAN, PUBLIC SERVANT, UPON HER RETIREMENT

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on July 13, the Immigration and Naturalization Service will honor Vernice Lohman on her retirement after 30 years of Federal service and a lifetime of selfless, public-minded citizenship.

Vernice was born in 1924 at the French Hospital in Los Angeles, which is currently a home for the elderly in the heart of Chinatown. She moved to San Fernando Valley where she graduated from North Hollywood High School in 1942.

Hoping to become a member of Jackie Cochran's Womens' Air Transport Group, she joined the Navy in 1943. The group disbanded shortly after she had begun training and, undeterred by this frustration, she undertook flight training at Independence, CA, and served in World War II as an enemy aircraft spotter for civil defense. While at her first duty station with the Navy, in San Diego, she met her husband-to-be, a marine, and they were married in 1945. Her daughter, Yvette, was born in 1950 at the base hospital in Camp Pendleton, CA.

Vernice began working for the Government in 1954, retiring 30 years later, as an examiner for the Immigration and Naturalization Service. In this capacity she handled cases from throughout the greater Los Angeles area. On many occasions she was particularly helpful to my district office in Long Beach. When, for example, a constituent asked me what was holding up a petition for naturalization, at my request she would wade into a swamp of endless, disorganized files and redtape that would have paled the most battle-hardened bureaucrat, and quickly provide me with a response. Her efficiency and willingness to assist not only helped me provide better constituent services but was an invaluable service to the Immigration and Naturalization Service and to the countless numbers of individuals to whom the Immigration and Naturalization Service was the most important key to their future life in America. She took many snags out of what is normally a lengthy and tedious process.

My wife, Lee, joins me in extending our thanks to Vernice Lohman on a job well done., We wish her and her daughter, Yvette, only the best in the future.●

OPPOSITION TO H.R. 4784

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives will shortly be considering H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984. I rise to alert my colleagues to three provisions of that bill which promise to turn otherwise worthy reforms into a veritable gauntlet thrown into the arena of the international trade market.

Specifically, the provisions regarding foreign industrial targeting subsidies, natural resources subsidies, and third party downstream dumping constitute unilateral changes in our law which contradict longstanding U.S. and international trade policy, and leave our U.S. exporters and workers vulnerable to certain retaliation by the European Economic Community and others.

While there is no doubt that reforms are sorely needed to strengthen, streamline and update U.S. law governing injurious unfair trade practices, such reforms would be worthless if they are undertaken at the expense of American companies and workers.

Section 105(a) of the bill attempts to deal with the problem of foreign industrial targeting practices by treating them as subsidies subject to U.S. countervailing duty legislations. Although I fully support the goal of this provision—to control unfair targeting practices—I believe that the vehicle chosen to implement that goal is inappropriate.

First, to pass the legislation as written would be to enact an unnecessary, unilateral expansion of our countervailing duty law. There are already mechanisms in existence to address those practices, such as targeting, which are illegal and inconsistent with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—the GATT. As a matter of principle, the United States should pursue a multilateral solution to targeting in the GATT or through bilateral diplomacy. Such action would protect and strengthen the GATT and the spirit of international trade cooperation which it attempts to establish. If foreign governments fail to respond to the GATT or bilateral diplomacy, the United States can still retaliate, pursuant to section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, against unreasonable and unjustifiable foreign government practices which burden U.S. commerce.

Second, this provision is unworkable from an administrative standpoint. Contervailing duty law requires an allocation of the amount of a subsidy to the price of an imported product. The Commerce Department has stated that there is no realistic way to calculate the full benefit of the subsidy. Quantifying the economic benefits of such practices as home market protection and restrictions on foreign investment, especially practiced over a long period of time and in differing market conditions, would be an exercise in pure speculation. These determinations would thus be at risk on judicial review. The resulting uncertainty is contrary to the expressed purpose of this legislation, which is to achieve greater certainty and simplicity of remedies available to correct unfair targeting practices.

My third objection to this provision is that the definition of targeting is so broad that it would subject many forms of legitimate Government behavior to countervailing duties. The bill defines targeting as "any Government plan or scheme consisting of coordinated actions * * * the effect of which is to assist the beneficiary to become more competitive in the export of any class or kind of merchandise." A few examples will illustrate the ludicrous result of this provision's overbreadth. Our space program could be classified as an "unfair targeting practice," since it has the effect of aiding U.S. exports of computers, semiconducters and satellites, even though its purposes are wholly unrelated to export promotion. Because our agricultural programs have the effect, though not the purpose, of aiding the competitiveness of U.S. agricultural exports, they too would be "unfair." Our defense procurement practices would also be "unfair targeting" since they have the effect of benefiting U.S. aircraft and aerospace products. American industries would be similary threatened. Activities regularly occurring now, such as assistance to joint ventures, investment restrictions, research and development coordination and administration of various antitrust exemptions by the Government, would fall under the definition of "unfair targeting practices" in this section.

Finally, and most importantly, this provision would invite mirror legislation and retaliation by foreign governments. If those trading partners who have antidumping and countervailing duty laws of their own should copy this legislation, it would seriously harm our own economy and the international competitiveness of our exports. Moreover, unilateral expansion of our definition of a subsidy is sure to provoke a challenge under the GATT—a challenge which could result in GATT authorization to retaliate.

My second major area of concern is section 105(a)(1)(C) of H.R. 4784. This section provides for a natural resources subsidy, which not only departs from longstanding U.S. and international practice regarding the definition of a subsidy, but also would ignore the GATT's clear recognition that some subsidies can be used legitimately by governments "to promote important objectives of social and economic policy."

This departs from accepted policy in that the practice of such dual pricing benefits a nation's economy as a whole and not a particular industry or sector. Longstanding definitions of a countervailable "subisidy" require that it attempt to give one or more industries a special advantage over other industries in the same economy. It is therefore basic that Government programs and activities which are generally available, such as irrigation projects, investment tax credits, police and fire protection, public health programs, and the like, are not considered to be countervailable domestic subsidies, even though they could be said to benefit companies by indirectly lowering their cost of production.

This section would subject generally available domestic programs to countervailing duties. Again, if our trading partners enact mirror legislation, the results to U.S. trade could be disastrous. There can be no question that U.S. industries benefit from Government energy policies and Government control of natural resources. Western agricultural products benefit from Government irrigation projects. Industries in the Tennessee Valley and the Pacific Northwest benefit from Government electricity. The European Economic Community has argued in the past that U.S. textiles benefit from low U.S. natural gas prices. Accepting the natural resource provision in H.R. 4784 would place our own exports at risk.

The legislation as it stands would seriously affect companies having planned and constructed facilities in foreign countries in return for certain economic incentives for locating there. These actions are in full accord with existing U.S. trade policies which encourage private investment as the preferred method for helping such countries with their economic development. If this legislation is enacted, subjecting the products being produced to duty simply because of a natural resource cost advantage that had been freely negotiated in the past, considerable damage would result to these companies. Any increase in the cost of such products will be felt by the American consumer.

My final major area of concern is section 104(b), regarding antidumping duty investigations. This provision would apply antidumping law to cases of third party dumping. This is clearly GATT illegal, would cause serious unfairness to innocent purchasers, and is likely to result in abstract and unrealistic calculations of dumping.

Article VI of the GATT defines dumping as sales at less then normal value of a like product. The product is dumped if sold at less than fair value, regardless of whether the price can be attributed to a below-cost component. If the product is sold at or above fair market value, it is not considered "dumped" even if one or more components were "dumped." Article VI also prohibits subjecting imports to countervailing and dumping duties to compensate for the same situation.

The provision as it is written would contradict the GATT in both these respects.

H.R. 4784 would determine whether downstream dumping occurs by reference to the "generally available price" of a component part in the country where the product is produced. Thus, efficient firms would be penalized for having prices below the industry average in the country, and innocent firms would be penalized for pricing behavior on the part firms whose component parts they utilized, over which they could exercise no control.

The downstream dumping provisions would be impossible to administer in a fair, realistic and expeditious way. It would require the Department of Commerce to conduct simultaneous investigations of both the product and all its materials and components for any complaint of dumping behavior. The determination of a "generally available price" in a country with different markets, buyers and conditions of sale, is likely to require speculative and arbitrary calculations that have little or no basis in economic reality. Such calculations would be subject to challenge. In short the provision would cause complexity and uncertainty, although it was intended to achieve just the opposite.

In sum, I believe it would be irresponsible of this body to pass H.R. 4784 without taking a long and careful look at the likely consequences of these three provisions to American consumers, companies, and economy. I urge my colleagues to join me in taking that long look, and in opposing this bill as written.●

NORMANDY INVASION

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, recently the House of Representatives marked the 40th anniversary of the Normandy invasion, when American and allied troops stormed the shores of France to liberate Europe from the tyranny of Hitler's Nazis. In marking the anniversary of D-day, many of us found it hard to believe that 40 long years has passed since that important moment in history. That 40 years have passed makes the following story all the more remarkable, Mr. Speaker.

In 1943 there was a young man named Jack Wagner who lived in Selinsgrove, PA, which is in my congressional district. Wagner entered the military service that year and in 1944 was killed when returning from a bombing run over Germany. The B-24 he was on crashed off the coast of Denmark, and his body was found near the shore of Marstal, a Danish town occupied by the Germans.

Before the Germans could bury Wagner, the citizens of Marstal removed his personal belongings and then notified his relatives in the United States of his demise. The townspeople, who considered Wagner a hero in his efforts to liberate their country, conducted a funeral ceremony for the fallen soldier. Since that time, two citizens of Marstal have kept a vigil over the American's grave, keeping a flag of the United States flying at the gravesite and placing fresh flowers there every week. This practice has continued for 40 years, Mr. Speaker, and it symbolizes stronger than any words possibly can the gratitude of many Europeans for our participation in World War II in the name of freedom.

The people of Selinsgrove, PA, will be saluting those honorable people of Marstal in July 11, the anniversary of Sergeant Wagner's burial. I would like to add my words of commendation for our Danish friends to the many others that will be spoken that day. In addition, I would like to enter into the RECORD the written statement of Doris Woll, the sister of Jack Wagner, as she describes her first visit to the gravesite of her brother in Denmark in 1980. I am certain that my colleagues will find her comments just as moving as I did, and they will greatly admire the courage and honor of the Mortensens of Marstal who have looked after the grave of Jack Wagner for 40 years.

THE MARSTAL STORY

My brother, Jack Elwood Wagner, died in a crash of two American B-24 bombers over the North Sea on June 20, 1944. They had just completed a bombing raid on Kiel, Germany and were returning to their base in England. Our family received word on July 3, 1944 that Jack was missing in action.

In August of 1944, our family received word that Jack's body had been found by Danish Fishermen fishing off the coast of Aero Island at the town of Marstal, Denmark, at that time was occupied by Nazi Germany. The Danes despised the Germans, and so the Underground Movement there was strong. A Danish woman was one of the leaders of this movement and she sent word via a British flyer through Switzerland on July 08, 1944 that Jack's body had been found. Before they turned his body over to the Germans' they removed all his personal things except his dog tags. Jack was buried at 5:00 A.M. by the Germans on July 11, 1944. After the Germans left the cemetery the whole town of Marstal turned out for Christian Burial Services for Jack.

In September of 1980 my husband Jim and I decided that we would take a trip to Denmark to visit my brother's grave. His sister Ruth Fitzpatrick and a friend decided to make the trip with us. We arrived in Copenhagen, Denmark and immediately fell in love with the country and the people.

We went to the train station to see what we could do about getting tickets to go to Marstal. Marstal is a town on a small Island off the coast of Denmark. We were informed we would have to take a train, two buses, and two ferry boats.

We bought our tickets and the next day left for Marstal. On the last leg of our journey which was by ferry, we met a man and woman who were fascinated by our Polaroid Camera. We got into a conversation and discovered they had a summer home in Marstal. The man was originally from Minn. He had been in Europe during World War II, married a Danish girl and settled there. We told him why we were going to Marstal.

As we came into port he said, "See that row of popular trees over there? That is where you will find the cemetery". We thanked him and left the boat. We had decided to stay overnight before we left Copenhagen, so we had rooms at the Hotel in Marstal. We checked in and decided to go to the cemetery before dark.

We walked up one of the streets and found a flower shop where we purchased a pot of mums to take with us. We had no idea what we might find when we got there, but I knew I had to have flowers for Jack's grave. When we got there, the cemetery was just beautiful. Unlike cemeteries here in this country, in Marstal no one walks on a grave there. There are paths all around each grave and each grave is outlined, either with flowers or small trees and shrubs. We had no idea where to look for Jack's grave. Jim saw a caretaker and he asked where we might find the Americans' graves. The man did not understand so Jim said to him, "Jack Wagner's grave", the man said "Ah Jack", and he took us right to it.

Jack is the only American buried in that cemetery. The grave was more than any of us expected. Small cedar trees outlined the grave and all the flowers on it were red, white, and blue with an American flag in the upper left corner. The flowers we took only crowded the others already planted there.

The caretaker took us to the office. A man we met there was ten years old when Jack was buried and was there for the services on July 11, 1944. We talked awhile and asked who takes care of the graves, for we thought we might leave money for perpetual care. The man gave us a woman's name and address and a small hand drawn map so that we could find the house.

Ruth and Alice returned to the hotel, but Jim and I set out to find this very kind woman named Latalia Mortinsen. We found the street and decided that I should try the first house. As I rang the bell, I saw the name N. Mortinsen over the bell. A very pleasant little man answered and I told him who I was. He called his wife and said "It's Jack's sister from America". She shook my hand, hugged me, and kissed me, then stood back and said "You've finally come". It was as if she had been waiting for one of us to come. Jim and I were really given the royal treatment and welcome. They poured coffee, drinks, food, cigarettes, cigars, and anything we wanted was ours.

This kind Danish woman and her husband have cared for Jack's grave since July 11, 1944. Each week they go there on Saturday mornings to weed and replace any dead flowers. The small cedars edging the grave had just been replanted in the spring because the others had grown too tall.

Jack was buried on July 11, 1944 and on September 21, his birthday, the people of Marstal placed his tombstone on his grave. This stone was placed there at no expense to the American Government, but by the people of Marstal who were so grateful for Jack's sacrifice.

Mrs. Mortinsen told us of seeing the two planes collide in mid-air, of their search for the body and all the events leading up to and including his burial. Mrs. Mortinsen gave us pictures to bring home to my folks. They were pictures taken the day of the funeral and others, through the years.

We never dreamed when we went to Marstal that we would find such a beautiful grave or the woman who has cared for it all those years. When we were there, Mrs. Mortinsen had been looking over it for 37 years. When she is no longer alive, it has been written into the town by-laws that the grave will be looked after by the town.

She told us the only problem she has had through the years was getting American flags. She said she had contacted the American Embassy in Copenhagen for flags but never received an answer. Mrs. Mortinsen puts a new flag on the grave three times a year. Jack's birthday, Christmas, and May 20th. We sent her twelve flags on September 1, and they arrived in Marstal on Jack's birthday, September 21. We believe this was one of the greatest trips of our lives. Jack could not be in a more beautiful spot and we could never find another woman like Mrs. Mortinsen.

She had never seen a picture of Jack and she asked me to find her one. Her response upon receiving the picture was that he was so handsome, so young, such a waste.

Our family will be eternally grateful to Latalia and Nells Mortinsen for feeling that Jack was one of theirs and looking after his grave all these many years. They are truly remarkable people and I feel they deserve some recognition from the American Government. Their feeling in Marstal is "He died for us".●

COMMENDING THE GREEK CULTURAL ORGANIZATION CYPRECO ON THEIR SECOND ANNUAL FOLK FESTIVAL

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to call the attention of my colleagues to a distinguished cultural organization in my district, the Cypriot Emmigrants Cultural Organization, CYPRECO. On July 19, 1984, CYPRECO will open their Second Cypriot Arts Exhibition at the Bohemian Hall in Astoria, Queens.

This Greek cultural and folk dance group is the only purely Cypriot cultural organization in New York. Their purpose is to provide a network for promoting the Greek culture among Cypriots in America. They are also eager to entertain and educate non-Cypriot Americans about their culture.

Last year their festival was an outstanding success, more than 6,000 people attended. This year, they are planning an exhibition dedicated to the unique customs and traditions of the Cypriot people, with authentic musicians, dancers, singers, and artists from Cyprus performing these events. Special booths hosting various Greek and Cypriot organizations and companies promoting their products and services will be outside the hall. With the assistance of the Ministry of Culture of Cyprus, this 4-day event will be very exciting.

It is important for the American people to gain a greater understanding of the many different cultures that make up our Nation. By hosting this festival, CYPRECO is doing a great service to the community, and fosters a greater understanding among many peoples, and for this I wish to commend them.●

THE DISTINGUISHED MILITARY CAREER OF COL. JOHN B. CARTAFALSA

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest pleasure that I rise to bring to the attention of my colleagues the distinguished military career of Col. John B. Cartafalsa, of Roslyn Harbor, NY. Colonel Cartafalsa is retiring from military service of the United States after 32 years as a commissioned officer.

A noted New York trial attorney in civilian life, Colonel Cartafalsa has also compiled an outstanding record as an officer in the U.S. Army. His military career began in June 1952, when he was commissioned a second lieutenant, infantry, from the City College of New York ROTC. After service with the 101st Airborne Division at Camp Breckinridge, KY, Colonel Cartafalsa became a combat platoon leader in the 1st Cavalry Division until he was separated from active duty in May 1954.

Although returning then to civilian life, and beginning law school at New York University, Colonel Cartafalsa was determined to continue to serve his country in the Active Reserves, entering the Judge Advocate Reserve School as a student later in 1954. After promotion to the rank of captain, Colonel Cartafalsa served as a general courts martial defense attorney with the Fourth JAG Detachment from its inception as a unit until October 1965. After promotion to the rank of major, he was assigned to the Army Air Defense Command of the 6th Army at Fort Baker, CA, as mobilization designee—staff judge advocate, and then served for 10 years with the 356th Civil Affairs Area "B" Headquarters, first as staff judge advocate, then as Assistant Section Chief of the Government Section.

In that service he was promoted to lieutenant colonel and received his colonelcy in April 1979. At that time, Colonel Cartafalsa was assigned to staff judge advocate with the 301st Support Group "A." For the past 2 years, Colonel Cartafalsa has been assigned to staff judge advocate, 8th Medical Brigade.

Mr. Speaker, this brief capsulization of Colonel Cartafalsa's military career gives only a hint of the wide-ranging responsibilities and duties which he assumed and carried to completion with such remarkable competency and skill. As an indication of his superlative performance of his duties, Colonel Cartafalsa has been honored with a number of awards and decorations including the Meritorious Service Medal, the Reserve Forces Achievement Medal with Oak Leaf Cluster, the National Defense Medal with Oak Leaf Cluster, the Army Commendation Medal and the Army Reserve Medal with Hourglass.

In addition to his LL.B. degree from New York University Law School, Colonel Cartafalsa has completed several law courses in the JAGS School, and has completed courses in the Industrial College of the Armed Forces, the Office of Civil Defense, and Command and General Staff College, including the full 4-year course there.

Mr. Speaker, our great Nation owes a real debt to dedicated citizens like Colonel Cartafalsa, who in addition to successful civilian careers, devote years of their lives to the Reserve Forces, where they help to maintain the strength and readiness of our national defenses. I know, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues join me in congratulating Colonel Cartafalsa on the conclusion of his 32-year career in the U.S. Army, and wish him continued success in his legal practice. I know his dedication and devotion to his country's needs are an inspiration to us all.●

HON. DANIEL B. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. DANIEL B. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce into the RECORD an article by Debra Braun of Dallas, TX. This article relates the gruesome and seldom seen results of one of the most atrocious acts that is allowed in our country; abortion. It might be easy for many Members to legislate abortion but the reality of what goes on in these abortion chambers is both morbid and sickening. Let's wake up before it's too late to stop this carnality.

DALLAS RTL DEDICATES BURIAL SITE OF 900 ABORTED BABIES

(By Debra Braun)

DALLAS, TX.—More than 600 pro-lifers gathered at Calvary Hill Cemetery on Mother's Day, May 13, to dedicate a gravesite where the bodies of 900–1,000 unborn babies have been buried. One speaker called the monument "a tomb to the unknown baby."

The bodies were recovered over a period of three months from a trash bin behind an abortion clinic, the Dallas Women's Center. Three women—Laura Weston, Kaye Thorogood, and Peggy Krebs—removed the bodies from the dumpster twice a week at various times of the day. No one ever questioned them about what they were doing.

In a recent newsletter of the Dallas Right to Life Committee, Mrs. Weston, 33, wrote that she never saw a pathology truck come to the clinic while she was sidewalk counseling there. She began to suspect that the abortion clinic was throwing the bodies in the trash.

"Finally, after much prayer," Mrs. Weston wrote, "I went to the dumpster behind the abortuary and peered in. The dumpster was filled with many large plastic bags; one of the ones on top was oozing blood."

She wrote that she dreaded opening the bag, and decided to take it home. She opened the bag and found a smaller plastic bag inside, labeled "Collection Bag," which was full of blood.

"In this bag was the tiny body of a beautiful baby boy," she wrote. "His head has been ripped off, and his chest was torn open, but through my horror and sorrow, I could not help but be struck by the wonder and perfection of this tiny body . . . Since then, I have seen hundreds of other babies, some as small as the end of my finger, others (had they not been torn apart) would be larger than my hand. All were wonderfully recognizable little boys and girls. Their bodies were compelling testimony, both to the beauty of God's handiwork, and the horror of man's."

After baptizing the babies, the women took the bodies to Calvary Hill Cemetery to be buried in a plot purchased by Dallas RTL. Mrs. Weston said that Christians have respect for man in his totality, body and soul, because they believe that God dwells in humans. "In times past, burial of the dead was a hallmark of a Christian society," she wrote.

The Knights of Columbus bought the gravestone. Engraved on it is a picture of a child in the arms of Christ and a quote from Isaiah 49: "Can a mother forget her infant, be without tenderness for the child of her womb? Even should she forget, I will never forget you."●

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO CAPT. DAVID G. KALB, U.S. NAVY

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this Friday, June 29, marks the end of the long and distinguished active duty career of Capt. David G. Kalb, U.S. Navy. For the past several years, Captain Kalb has served as supervisor of shipbuilding, conversion, and repair in Long Beach, CA.

Among Captain Kalb's many duties during his tenure of command has been supervising the highly successful construction of the FFG–7 class guided missile frigates by the Todd Shipyard in San Pedro. The ships built under this program have consistently come in ahead of schedule and within budget, and have received high words of praise for the superior quality of their construction. This exceptional track record can certainly be attributed in large part to the professionalism demonstrated by Captain Kalb in his work with Todd Shipyard, as well as with other Navy suppliers and the shipbuilders in the area.

Captain Kalb began his naval career upon graduation from the U.S. Naval Academy in June 1960. Following graduation he served at sea aboard two destroyers, the U.S.S. Lowry and the U.S.S. Douglas H. Fox. He then spent 3 years as a graduate student at the Webb Institute of Naval Architecture, earning a bachelor's degree in marine engineering and a master's degree in naval architecture.

To utilize the skills acquired at the Webb Institute, he then began a series of varied assignments which included the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard; supervisor of shipbuilding, conversion, and repair at New Orleans; the Pearl Harbor Naval Shipyard; and most recently the Long Beach Naval Shipyard.

Captain Kalb also had two noteworthy assignments overseas. In January 1970, he went to Saigon, Vietnam, where he was in charge of the program of building ferro-cement ships and also served on the staff of the U.S. Naval Support Activity. His second overseas tour came in 1975, when he was assigned to El Ferrol, Spain, as resident shipbuilding liaison officer working with his Spanish counterparts in completing five guided missile frigates for use by the Spanish Navy.

Although his plans for retirement are at present somewhat uncertain, my wife, Lee, joins me in wishing Capt. Dave Kalb and his wife, Brenda Elaine, all the best in whatever the future holds for them.●

INCREASED PAYMENTS FOR PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATING CONVENTIONS

HON. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to inform my colleagues that the Committee on Ways and Means today reported H.R. 5950, to increase the Federal contribution for the Quadrennial Political Party Presidential National Nominating Conventions.

I wish to serve notice, pursuant to the rules of the Democratic Caucus, that I have been instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to seek less than an open rule for the consideration of this bill by the House of Representatives.●

ASBESTOS WORKERS RECOVERY ACT

HON. RON PACKARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MURPHY, and a number of my colleagues in sponsoring the Asbestos Workers Recovery Act. This bill proposes to establish a more rational and efficient means by which to ensure that workers who contract an asbestos-related disease receive prompt and equitable compensation, consistent with the degree of injury from which they suffer.

Much has been written and reported regarding the potential risks associated with excessive asbestos exposure. Among the diseases known to be associated with asbestos exposure are asbestosis, a scarring of the lung; lung cancer, where asbestos exposure combines with other agents, such as cigarette smoke, to increase the risk; and mesothelioma, a relatively rare, and always fatal, form of cancer. Each of these diseases is characterized by a long latency period—as much as 40 years or more—between the time of a worker's exposure and the onset of injury.

Workers who have been injured by asbestos are eligible for compensation for lost wages and medical expenses under State or Federal workers' compensation programs, but too often these systems are bypassed completely in favor of filing a tort lawsuit against third-party manufacturers. Today, upward of 25,000 such lawsuits are pending in State and Federal courts throughout the Nation, and scientists estimate that between 80,000 and 300,000 workers may ultimately be affected.

None of the parties to this catastrophe believe that continued litigation is a socially acceptable means by which to compensate legitimately injured workers. Too often, those who are injured and in need of immediate help face lengthy delays before their case can be heard or a reasonable settlement concluded. My own State of California faces the largest numbers of asbestos lawsuits, in excess of 4,000. Even the most optimistic observer would have to concede that this backlog of cases makes it unlikely that cases filed today will be adjudicated for years to come.

Mr. Speaker, even when a case does finally come to trial, the results have been markedly inconsistent. Workers with medically clear-cut cases often receive relatively little while plantiffs with less certain or less severe injuries receive many times more. There is simply no rhyme or reason to the judgments, and given the vast scope of the problem we as a society must develop an equitable alternative.

The Asbestos Workers Recovery Act we introduce today does just that. The bill provides that any worker who establishes the presence of an asbestos-related disability to the satisfaction of the appropriate workers' compensation program, would automatically be entitled to an additional, supplemental, benefit in lieu of a lengthy tort proceeding. The system envisioned by the bill would thus assure that injured workers receive any State or Federal workers' compensation benefits to which they may be entitled, and uses that workers' compensation determination as the basis for determining eligibility for an award from third-party defendants. Such a system would save workers the time, expense, and frustration of filing a lawsuit and enduring lengthy delays; conserve the assets of third-parties to be used to compensate victims, rather than pay lawyers; and free judges to hear the many other cases that go undecided in the face of court dockets overloaded with asbestos cases.

Mr. Speaker, it is past time that the Congress take responsible action to address the human tragedy that has arisen in the asbestos cases. The Asbestos Workers Recovery Act is a major step in this direction, and I encourage my colleagues to join with us in this endeaver.●

IMPORT RELIEF FOR AMERICAN INDUSTRIES AND WORKERS

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

● Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, since the Supreme Court on June 23, 1983, declared that the legislative veto is unconstitutional, the statutory provisions providing for congressional review of Executive actions in import relief cases filed under sections 201 and 406 of the Trade Act of 1974 have been left in legal limbo. In effect, the Supreme Court's holding has upset the careful balance of authority between the President and the Congress that has long been an integral part of our import relief statutes. In the wake of Chadha, therefore, the congressional safeguards on the President's discretion to refuse or revise recommended import relief are no longer enforceable, leaving the Congress without a formal means of reviewing the President's decision.

Under current law, the International Trade Commission [ITC] is authorized to investigate cases alleging that a domestic industry is being injured or threatened by increasing imports. Section 201, the so-called escape clause, covers actions involving excessive imports from non-Communist countries, while section 406 applies to actions where Communist countries are the source of increased imports. If the ITC determines that a domestic industry is being injured, or threatened with injury from rising imports, it must then recommend to the President import relief that would allow the domestic industry to adjust to greater import competition. The President then has authority, after reviewing the ITC's recommendation in light of several statutory criteria, to accept the ITC's relief plan, offer relief which differs from the ITC recommendation, or deny relief entirely.

In granting the President broad discretion to vary the relief recommended by the ITC, however, Congress also reserved authority to override the President's action by adopting a concurrent resolution of disapproval. But the Chadha decision's subsequent impact on the legislative veto has effectively removed Congress from the decisionmaking process in import relief cases. With Congress now stripped of its override authority, the President in effect has unlimited leeway to reject, in whole or in part, the ITC's recommended relief. The President, for example, could conceivably deny a domestic industry any import relief, despite an ITC finding that the industry is suffering serious injury, on the grounds that import relief is not in the national economic interest. The injured domestic industry would then be sacrificed for broader national interest without Congress undertaking a formal review of the conflicting interests at stake or exercising any check on the President's decision.

Hence, it is vital that present law be revised to restore congressional input into our import relief decisions. The current uncertainty surrounding Congress' oversight in import relief cases can be resolved to ensure that the legislative branch will participate in the review of the President's final import relief decisions. In short, Congress must adopt legislation which maintains the interbranch balance of responsibility in the decisionmaking process and provides the legislative branch with a formal check on Executive discretion.

The bill I am introducing today would accomplish this goal and also meet the constitutional objections to the legislative veto that were raised in the Chadha ruling. Specifically the bill would revise section 203 of the Trade Act of 1974 to require that, in the event the President proposes relief which differs from that recommended by the ITC, the ITC relief recommendation be implemented unless the Congress adopts a joint resolution approving the President's separate action. The procedure for adoption of the approval resolution would follow the so-called "fast-track" rule provided for in section 151 of the Trade Act of 1974, thus allowing for prompt congressional consideration of the President's action. The joint resolution of approval, in effect, operates as a bill which must be presented to the President for his signature or veto. By requiring that the joint resolution be presented to the President, the constitutional problems posed by the present concurrent resolution provision are remedied. Thus, should the President fail to sign the approval resolution, the ITC's original recommendation for import relief must be implemented by the President within the prescribed time.

Although the Congress has never employed the override authority contained in the escape clause provision, the very availability of such authority serves to ensure that the President will remain responsive to congressional views when he exercises his discretion to offer relief. On the other hand, the absence of any congressional check on the President's discretionary authority may permit the executive branch to deemphasize Congress' concerns, effectively closing off any legislative recourse for injured domestic industries that are denied relief by the President.

It is especially urgent that the Congress act to restore its override authority in import relief action. This urgency is heightened by the unusual number of import relief cases now pending before the ITC. In those cases where the ITC finds injury, the President will be required to decide which industries should receive relief and what form that relief will take.

The bill that I am introducing today would fully reestablish Congress' oversight authority in import relief cases, and involve Congress in the final decisionmaking process. Moreover, this bill would ensure that Congress uses a constitutional method to review Presidential import relief actions, one that requires the Congress to affirmatively concur in the President's decision to offer relief which differs from the ITC's recommendation. Thus, the bill effectively requires the President and Congress to join in designing import relief which allows injured domestic industries and their workers to adjust excessive imports, but does not adversely affect other national economic interests.

In view of the impelling need for a constitutionally workable replacement for the legislative veto in our import relief laws, I again urge my colleagues to give this bill their careful and prompt consideration.●

TRIBUTE TO JOHN C. SANCHEZ

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues from California, Mr. MINETA, and myself, it is with great pleasure that I bring to the attention of our colleagues a remarkable individual, John C. Sanchez, and recognize the outstanding service he provides as postmaster of the city of Santa Clara.

John Sanchez is one of the most respected and beloved men in his community. He has worked for the U.S. Postal Service for 37 years, having been promoted to postmaster in 1967. During his tenure, he has earned the admiration of his employees as well as all the postmasters in the area.

A lifetime resident of Santa Clara, John Sanchez married Rita Arnold in 1947. They have two sons, John and Peter. John's duties with the Postal Service began as a temporary subclerk in 1947 after serving his country in the U.S. Army.

The admiration Mr. Sanchez receives from everyone who comes in contract with him is due to his incredible sense of humor, warm personality and intelligence. He handles every situation that arises with complete competence and fairness. It is these rare qualities that have endeared him to the many friends he has in the community.

I know our colleagues join us in saluting this wonderful public servant. His outstanding contributions to the Postal Service and to the county of Santa Clara will be long remembered. We thank him from the bottom of our hearts for all he has given.●

THE PERUVIAN CRISIS

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, recent mass protests by Peruvian teachers and civil servants over economic issues, and the ensuing declaration by Peruvian President Fernando Belaunde Terry of a nationwide state of emergency—including the suspension of constitutional rights of free assembly—have ripened internal conditions that could lead to civil war in Peru. The deteriorating state of Peru's economy and the alarming increase in human rights violations by that nation's security forces raise serious questions concerning President Belaunde's commitment to democratic practices.

Kevin Kecskes and John Schafer, staff researchers at the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, have prepared a timely analysis outlining recent developments of Peru's explosive situation. I commend their report to the attention of my colleagues and urge that you familiarize yourselves with the most recent developments in what may well become the next Latin American hot spot.

PERU SLIPPING INTO CIVIL WAR UNDER BELAUNDE'S MILITARIZED LEADERSHIP

(By Kevin J. Kecskes and John Schafer, COHA staff researchers)

Unable to stem terrorist strikes by an anarchistic guerrilla insurgency and confronted with Peru's worst financial crisis of the century—a result partially due to the inept management of the economy—the Peruvian government of President Fernando Belaunde Terry has unleashed a counterinsurgency campaign without quarter. The offensive, launched by the military, has spilled over innocent civilians, including intimidation and human rights violations against opposition political leaders, labor unionists and government critics, leading many to fear that Peru's days as a functioning democracy may be numbered.

While the military battle the Maoist Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path) guerrillas in Peru's southern region surrounding Ayacucho, Lima's police force was turned loose against waves of teacher and civil servant protests. Late last week, Belaunde declared a national 30-day state of emergency in the face of the largest strike by public employees in the country's history, when 130,000 teachers walked off their jobs on June 4. The next day, approximately 600,000 civil servants and their supporters joined in a general strike of indefinite duration. Union leaders responded to Belaunde's June 8 declaration by promising mass hunger strikes and sit-ins, and to continue the ongoing protest until demands for higher wages are met. A State Department official described the state of emergency decree as a "preventative measure to get a handle on the right of assembly."

The state of emergency decree authorizes police personnel to search homes and make arrests without warrant, severely restricts travel throughout the country, and suspends all public rights of assembly, among other strictures.

Increasing reports of government torture and disappearances of suspected "subversives" in the Ayacucho area, where Sendero Luminoso is based, are accompanying the continuing growth of the military's freedom of action under Belaunde to flout the country's constitutional guarantees. The failure of Belaunde's efforts to alleviate Peru's economic crisis, in turn, has spawned the emerging waves of popular unrest that the government has sought to counter through sanctions against opposition media facilities and outright clampdowns on trade union strikes and dissident political leaders.

In a recent interview with COHA in Washington, Javier Diez Canseco, a Peruvian legislator, vice president of the Human Rights Commission of the Chamber of Deputies in Lima, and member of the Popular Democratic Union (UDP) party, charged that "the possibilities of change in Peru are being denied [by the government]. . . . Present conditions in Peru leave the way open for a very extended and violent civil war." Diez Canseco was suspended from exercising his Congressional privileges until next September for engaging in an unparliamentary procedure in challenging Belaunde's economic policies—yet another sign of the government's escalating commitment to employ political pressure and, in some cases, heavy sanctions against domestic opponents.

ECONOMIC CRUNCH REACHES A HEAD

Skyrocketing inflation and a dramatic drop in the standard of living for the poorest segment of the country's population have sparked numerous protests and strikes against Belaunde's economic policies this year, culminating in the current general strike. The annual inflation rate in Peru stood at about 125 percent last year, and real wage earnings of the country's work force have dropped 50 percent since Belaunde assumed office in July of 1980. A full 63 percent of the population currently is unemployed or underemployed. The legal minimum wage, for those who are fortunate enough to earn that much, is approximately $40 a month.

The Peruvian government's staggering foreign debt of $14 billion—for a country of 18 million people—has seriously aggravated the crisis by channeling precious public funds towards servicing a foreign debt, the bulk of which was contracted due to the wanton spending of the predecessor military government which rules the country from 1968 to 1980. The debt currently consumes over 50 percent of Peruvian export income while demanding a 30 percent share of the national budget. Gross National Product dropped 10 percent last year, and fell another one percent in the first quarter of 1984. Already, under Belaunde's presidency, the Peruvian sol has been devalued by approximately 1,100 percent, responding to IMF-mandated strictures for revitalizing the country's economy.

A CALL TO ARMS

One indication of the Peruvian military's growing power within the Belaunde administration is the recent purchase of 26 French-built Mirage 2000 fighter-bombers for a reported $700 million—an extraordinary expenditure for Belaunde to authorize as the IMF breathes down his back to cut domestic spending, and as hundreds of thousands of teachers and government workers take to the streets to demand long-overdue salary increases.

The government's nearly five-year-old war against Sendero Luminoso, which has extended the military's previous virtual free rein over 13 provinces—to now the entire country, has brought Peru to the brink of a general internal conflagration. Every day brings with it information of a dramatic increase in the tempo of human rights violations, including reports of torture, disappearances, psychological warfare against local inhabitants in areas surrounding Ayacucho, and summary executions—all ostensibly designed to thwart the rebel insurgency. Since Belaunde decreed a state of emergency in Ayacucho in 1981, Peruvian human rights sources have reported at least 1,500 cases of missing persons in that region alone.

HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES GALORE

As a key component of its counterinsurgency strategy, the military has formed squads of local civil defense forces, largely comprised of Indian peasants residing in affected areas. It was at the government's urging of one such group, in the Andean highland village of Uchuraccay, to beware of all "enemies [who] come on foot," that eight Peruvian journalists were tragically murdered in January 1983. The independent commission charged with probing the incident warned that "to accept or encourage the peasant communities to take justice into their own hands in response to Sendero Luminoso's abuses and crimes profoundly undermines the nation's judicial system and provides, unknowingly, a cover under which all kinds of personal revenge, ethnic and regional disputes and terrible accidents can be committed."

Mario Cavalacanti, dean of the Ayacucho Bar Association, and a critic of military human rights abuses in the region, has reported, in addition to the alleged 1,500 cases of missing persons—of which the Latin American Human Rights Association (ALDHU) has documented at least 600—that government forces have committed a number of extrajuridical killings, thefts of personal property, and rapes in the Andean zone. Cavalacanti also reported last February that, following a confrontation between police forces and Senderistas in the village of Silvia, a battalion from the crack anti-insurgency forces, known as Sinchis, occupied the town along with a Marine infantry unit and arrested 300 people. The forces then separated 54 of the villagers, executed them, and buried them in a common grave.

INCREASING CURBS ON PRESS

To the dismay of Peruvian human rights activists, such information and reports as provided by Cavalacanti rarely escapes the tight security curtain surrounding Ayacucho, as well as the 12 other military-administered provinces. In recent months, counterinsurgency forces have been vested with the responsibility of providing information to the capital. The resulting cocoon of silence now has spread to envelope all of Peru under the present state of emergency.

In response to past popular pressure to investigate reports of the military's human rights violations, President Belaunde has deployed civilian agents, or "fiscales," from Peru's state investigative authority to examine local police headquarters located in emergency zones where many of those missing reportedly have been detained, tortured and executed. But the failure of the fiscales to gain physical access into many outposts, in turn, ultimately resulted in a government clampdown on a leading Lima television political-affairs program.

Cesar Hildebrandt, one of the country's most respected political analysts and host of the popular "Vision" talk-show, accompanied a fiscal to a local military post armed with a camera, where a group of policemen reportedly had been detained for human rights abuses. Both the fiscal and Hildebrandt were denied entry to the facility. Subsequently, "Vision" aired the segment that Hildebrandt himself had shot on May 27. After a commercial break, the program never returned to the air. The station's owner later stated that the Hildebrandt program had lost "the moderation it should have had," according to Diez Canseco.

Luis Antonio Percovich, appointed interior minister in April, denounced the "Vision" segment as part of "an international communist campaign to undermine the Peruvian government and to discredit the armed forces." Spokesmen for the opposition United Left coalition, a grouping of six leftist political parties that won a considerable showing in last November's municipal elections—including the capture of the mayoralty of Lima—charged that "Vision's" shutdown was part of a dangerous trend among Belaunde government officials to stifle all opposition criticism of the government as next year's presidential election draws near, as well as to cover up officially—sanctioned human rights abuses.

In April, Lima's only remaining televised opposition voice, "Document," was shut down after its director ran a segment examining the abject living conditions faced by the captial's growing slum population. The opposition UDP charged that the government was utilizing the media services of Carlos Tizon, the country's leading construction tycoon, to erect a barrier to the flow of "negative" information about the government. Tizon, known for his millions as well as his strong ties with the government—permitting him to walk off with some of the most lucrative contracts for government-funded building projects—reportedly plays a major role in outbidding potential opposition competitors for buying Lima television programming time, which he later delegates to producers known to favor the government

PRINT MEDIA ALSO AFFECTED

The increasingly disgruntled and frustrated left-wing and liberal parties, despite the swelling numbers of their ranks, now face the real possibility that two of the remaining three opposition publications will go bankrupt, due to a government cutoff in vital public advertising revenues. Both El Observador and El Diario de la Marka, traditional critics of human rights violations committed by both the guerilla insurgency and the government forces, have encountered serous economic difficulties as a result of this policy. Nonetheless, the third and largest opposition newspaper, La Republica, is said to be thriving as its circulation soars due to an increasingly disaffected population.●

ALDENYS ACOSTA NAMED 1984 NEW JERSEY BOYS CLUB YOUTH OF THE YEAR

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to report the selection of a young man from Jersey City as "Youth of the Year" by the New Jersey Area Council of the Boys Clubs of America. His name is Aldenys Acosta.

Aldenys is only in the United States 5 years, arriving from the Dominican Republic with his family to reside in the downtown section of Jersey City. This young man is now a sophomore at St. Peter's Prep in Jersey City. While he now has an excellent command of the English language, he spoke no English just 5 years ago.

When Aldenys Acosta came to the United States 5 years ago, he said he had a choice between "the streets," or becoming someone his folks could be proud of.

He chose the latter, and last week was rewarded by the New Jersey Boys Clubs of America for his outstanding deeds for the community and others.

Acosta, who is 17, was chosen as the organization's "Youth of the Year" from among 16 Boys Clubs finalists during the 15th annual dinner at the Town & Campus Restaurant in Union. He rceived a plaque and a $500 prize.

The more than 1,000 Boys Clubs of America serve approximately 1.2 million youngsters who are primarily from urban areas and disadvantaged backgrounds.

Programs include youth employment, sports, and computer literacy programs. The clubs are open daily and are run by professional staffs.

As the winner of the award presented by the New Jersey Area Council of Boys Clubs, for which girls are also eligible for participation, Acosta will be entered in the National Youth of the Year competition along with eight other contenders from the Northeast.

The winner will compete in Washington in September against three other regional winners for a $5,000 prize, which will be presented by President Reagan.

He is a former teachers' aide at St. Joseph's School for the Blind in Jersey City, and helped organize a cleanup project at the city hall area in Jersey City. For the cleanup, he was given a citation by the city's mayor.

When the Jersey City Boys Club building was destroyed by fire last year, Acosta arranged for its members to meet in various homes and schools to keep the programs alive.

One of five children in his family, Acosta also worked on the renovation of his apartment building in Jersey City.

Though the youth can add the Boys Clubs award to the Prep Spirit Award he received as a freshman in high school, and others for swimming and gymnastics abilities, he said helping others is the most rewarding experience of all.

"I could have just hung around in the streets doing nothing," Acosta said, "But that just wastes a lot of time. I want to make something of myself."

In the future, he plans to attend college to study economics or management.

Because of the fire several years ago at the Whittier House Boys Club, a famed haven for families in Jersey City, a new structure is nearing completion.

I was pleased, several years ago, to help obtain a Federal grant of about $200,000 for the reconstruction of an old coal bunker on Canal Street as the new Jersey City Boys Club. This Federal grant has served as a catalyst for the community to raise almost $2 million to aid in the reconstruction. The site is now a filled-in area for the famous Morris Canal, which played such an important role in the industrial development of our Nation.

The new coal bunker, with additions thereto, is scheduled to be dedicated later on this summer.

I believe the article written in the Wednesday, June 27 edition of the Bergen Record, quoted below, helps tell the whole story:

When the Grand Street Jersey City Boys Club burned down in November 1981, a teen age immigrant from the Dominican Republic "kept the guys together," says Gary Greenberg, director of programming at the club.

Aldenys Acosta, who had not known a word of English a year before, was setting up meetings among club members in various borrowed rooms. "He couldn't see (the club) close, even though the building was gone," says Russ Triolo, executive director of the Boys Club of Union.

Last week Aldenys was named 1984 New Jersey Youth of the Year by the boys club for his dedication to the club and to the Jersey City community as a whole.

He was cited for the long hours he put in as a teachers' aide at St. Joseph's School for the Blind and for a project he led to clean up the Jersey City City Hall. To try to relieve tensions between senior citizens and teenagers, Aldenys and other club members shoveled snow free for the elderly.

"It's fun being in the snow," Aldenys says, "and when you do this for them, they like you. They stop thinking you're a drug addict or something."

"You do things for people," Aldenys says, "and when you pass by them, it just feels good to know that they like you."

Aldenys, 17, says he joined the boys club a few days after he arrived in this country four years ago. "It was tough not knowing the language," he recalls. But he says the boys at the club, by pointing out his mistakes, helped him learn English far better than the bilingual classes at school did.

Within a year he not only knew the language, but had made the honor roll at Jersey City's Public School 16. He was graduated as valedictorian of his eighth-grade class and won a scholarship to St. Peter's Prep. There he was elected freshman class president.

Now entering his junior year, he excels in gymnastics and diving, while upholding his academic record and working part time. "I don't like to waste time," he says.

Aldenys is the fourth of five children in his family. "We're a very united family," he says.

After the apartment building in which the Acostas' were living was condemned by the city, his family received a loan from First Jersey Bank and began fixing up an abandoned building on Barrow Street in Jersey City as part of a state pilot project known as the Family and Sweat Equity Program.

Nineteen families now occupy three structures, taking care of the buildings themselves. Aldenys was assigned to sit outside in the winter, watching the building to protect it from vandals.

Aldenys was "a clear winner" in competition with candidates from 15 other New Jersey clubs for the state Youth of the Year award. He was initially chosen from more than 600 Jersey City boys.

Aldenys will represent New Jersey in the Boys Club regional competition.

Greenberg describes Aldenys as a serious student who speaks out against vandalism and graffiti. Aldenys, because he is short, normally would be "the kid who gets picked on," Greenberg says, Yet "everyone knows and loves him . . . He doesn't preach to them."

"He gives you advice," says fellow club member Eric Ramirez, 15. "He helps you out with your problems."

"He serves as a role model for the other kids," Greenberg says, whether they're black, white, or Hispanic.

The other children look up to him, Ramirez says. "No one around here has got so much involvement."

Aldenys says he will go to college and start a career in business, where he can use his math skills. But he wants to continue being active in the community. "I plan," he emphasizes, "to come back to Jersey City."

Now, with help from corporate donations, a new boys club headquarters is being built on Canal Street in Jersey City. And that makes Aldenys happy.

"The boys club teaches good values in contrast to the bad values of the street," he said. "The boys club teaches kids to do the right thing."

It has been indeed refreshing for me to report this success story and recognition by the prestigious Boys Club of America.

This young man's determination and commitment to education indeed surpasses that of many of our native born youths. It fortifies our feeling for the greatness of America and the opportunity which it affords for persons of good will.

As you know, in the 14th District which I represent rests the grandest lady of all times, our Statute of Liberty, but a few hundred yards from the shores of Jersey City. Knowing of this latest success story provides me with further respect and admiration for our "Lady of the Harbor" and that for which she stands.●

IT IS TIME TO DECLARE WAR ON CONTAMINATED DRINKING WATER

HON. EDWARD R. MADIGAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

● Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am being joined today by DENNIS ECKART in introducing the Safe Drinking Water Act Amendments of 1984. This sorely needed legislation will modify the existing program to regulate drinking water in this country and will diminish the growing risks to public health from contamination of our drinking water supplies. I would like to briefly discuss the background of and need for this legislation, as well as some of its key provisions. A complete summary of the bill will follow my remarks.

I worked for 3 months last year with Congressman ECKART and other members of the Committee on Energy and Commerce to fashion a strong bipartisan bill to reauthorize the Safe Drinking Water Act. Those negotiations ended in December for a number of reasons, but one was the desire of certain environmental groups to have more time to examine the needs of the legislation and to make recommendations. These groups came to me last month and presented their views on the weaknesses of the current Safe Drinking Water Act. Mr. ECKART and I were able to work with groups such as the Environmental Policy Institute, the Clean Water Action Project, Friends of the Earth, the National Wildlife Federation and the National Resources Defense Council in formulating this legislation. Many of their suggestions were taken into account. Public water systems and various industrial groups were also involved, and I believe we have a piece of legislation that is completely fair to all concerned but is crucial to guaranteeing safe drinking water supplies in this country.

The need for this legislation is obvious. In a recent EPA random survey of metropolitan water systems, 28 percent were found to be contaminated by one or more toxic organic chemicals. In another random survey, 63 percent of the rural water supplies were also found to be contaminated. Our surface water supplies are polluted by over 700 synthetic organic chemicals, heavy metals, pesticides and other pollutants. The condition of our ground water supplies, which account for 50 percent of our drinking water, is also threatened. Ground water is subject to approximately 30 different sources of chemical contamination. These include hazardous waste landfills, surface impoundments, septic tanks and cesspools, and our latest cause for concern—leaking underground storage tanks. It is clear that we cannot solely rely on cleanup which is often technically or economically infeasible. Prevention of contamination is the only viable, long-term remedy for the problem.

I would like to briefly describe some of the key provisions of this bill. The legislation is divided into two main titles. The first is regulation of public water supplies, the second is a program for the protection of underground sources of drinking water.

The Safe Drinking Water Act is based on a system of mandatory national standards set to limit contaminant levels so as to protect public health. This is the cornerstone of the regulation of public water supplies. Unfortunately, progress in establishing these national maximum contaminant levels has been unacceptably slow. To date, EPA has promulgated less than 20 drinking water standards, and these do not include many toxic organic chemicals of greatest concern to the American public.

Standard setting would be greatly expedited under my bill. First, the 14 volatile organic compounds [VOC's] identified by EPA in 1982 must be regulated within 18 months of enactment of the bill. This regulation must occur unless the EPA Administrator publishes a determination that a national standard is not needed to prevent known or anticipated adverse effects on the health of persons. Second, the near 50 contaminants identified by EPA in a 1983 advanced notice of proposed rulemaking must be regulated within 36 months of enactment of the bill, unless the Administrator can make the negative determination outlined above for the VOC's. Third, EPA must publish an annual priority list of substances for review as possible drinking water contaminants, beginning in 1988. All substances placed on this list must be regulated within 3 years unless the Administrator finds that protection of the public health does not demand it. This type of mandated agency action is currently lacking in the regulatory scheme and represents a significant step in assuring safe and healthful supplies of drinking water. My bill also streamlines regulatory procedures under the act by eliminating the designation of "interim" standards and requiring that maximum contaminant level goals, formerly known as recommended maximum contaminant levels, be promulgated simultaneously with national primary drinking water regulations. Finally, the bill requires control technologies which are the best available—considering costs—rather than the best generally available as in current law.

My bill contains several additional improvements in the regulation of public drinking water supplies. A program is established requiring water companies to monitor for unregulated contaminants. The results of this monitoring would be made available to the public. The bill greatly strengthens the authority to enforce the drinking water standards. EPA is given authority to issue administrative orders and to take actions to address violations in primacy States, where the State is not diligently pursuing an enforcement action. EPA is given the authority to promulgate reasonable public notification requirements to relieve water companies from overly burdensome rules while preserving the rights of the water consumer to know of violations which may exist. Finally, stringent criminal sanctions are instituted for those who may tamper with a public water system.

Title II of the bill establishes a program to protect our vital underground sources of drinking water. I consider this the most significant aspect of the legislation next to mandating the promulgation of national drinking water regulations. Injection of hazardous wastes above or into a drinking water source is banned by this bill, except in conjunction with a Superfund cleanup action. Monitoring down gradient from deep, or class I wells, is instituted to ensure that there is no migration of waste as required by existing EPA regulations. Enforcement of UIC regulations is also greatly strengthened.

Several of our Federal environmental laws, including the Clean Air Act and the Coastal Zone Management Act, require States to develop a formal, legally enforceable strategy on the use of precious natural resources. In the area of ground water, such planning activities are lacking in many States. My bill rectifies this by requiring each State to develop and adopt a plan to protect underground sources of drinking water from contamination which may adversely affect the health of persons. Each plan must be approved by EPA.

The plan must contain a number of criteria to be approved. Among these are the designation of regulations, including best management practices [BMP's], to protect ground water supplies. States with oil and gas exploration must have provisions to protect against contamination from brine disposal. Areas with aquifers designated as sole or principal drinking water sources can also receive special protection and funds.

The bill contains two sanctions against those States that do not develop or implement a plan. A recalcitrant State will not only lose its primacy status but the State will also be subject to a citizens suit forcing compliance with the law. I know that some groups are fearful that Federal involvement in matters such as this can lead to Federal land use management and other undesirable intrusions. I want to make clear that the State plan provisions of this bill are meant to afford the State maximum flexibility in formulating a sensible strategy to protect public health from ground water contamination. EPA must approve a State's plan unless it clearly is not meeting the requirements of the provision. I believe that the requirement for State ground water plans is necessary to guarantee safe and healthful drinking water for future generations of Americans.

Mr. Speaker, it is time to declare war on contamination of our drinking water supplies. This legislation strikes a sound balance between the flexibility required to regulate the Nation's 69,000 different water systems and the active direction needed to provide consistently high quality drinking water throughout the country. I hope that many of my colleagues will soon be joining Mr. ECKART and I in sponsoring this legislation. A brief summary of all of the provisions of the legislation follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Title I

Section 101—Standard Setting

Interim regulations which have been promulgated pursuant to 1412(a)(1) of the Act are deemed "national primary drinking water regulations." This simplifies the statutory framework as there are no "revised" regulations, but all regulations can be amended under existing statutory conditions. (Sec. 101(a))

Within 18 months after enactment the bill would require the EPA to simultaneously propose MCL goals and national primary drinking water regulations for 14 volatile organic compounds (VOCs) listed by EPA in the Federal Register. In lieu of the above, the EPA can publish a determination that a national standard is not needed to prevent known or anticipated adverse effects on the health of persons. (Sec. 101(b)(1)(A))

Within 36 months after enactment of the bill, the same procedure would be followed for contaminants listed in Volume 44 of the Federal Register, page 45502. (Sec. 101(b)(1)(B))

The same procedure would be followed for any substance which the Administrator determines may have an adverse effect on the health of persons. On January 1, 1988, and yearly thereafter, EPA must publish a list establishing priorities and criteria for review of substances which may require regulation to prevent known or anticipated adverse health effects. Within 3 years of listing a contaminant, the above regulation procedure must be followed. (Sec. 101(b)(1)(C))

MCL goals are set at a level in which no known or anticipated adverse effects on health occur, with an adequate margin of safety. National regulations specify a level as close to an MCL goal as feasible (costs are considered).

Filtration as a treatment technique shall be proposed for raw surface water sources. Disinfection treatment technique regulations are to be promulgated for all public water systems. Variances from both requirements are possible.

Section 102—Monitoring for Unregulated Contaminants

EPA, by rule, shall establish a program of monitoring for unregulated contaminants. Monitoring frequency is based on number of persons served and contaminants likely to be found, with minimum requirements. EPA shall list unregulated contaminants to be monitored for, but States can add or delete from the list. EPA shall reimburse the costs of monitoring for systems with less than 150 connections.

Section 103—Enforcement of Regulations

In primacy States, the EPA is required to commence a civil action or to issue an administrative order to a public water system to comply with a standard, if the State has not acted before the thirtieth day after notification of violation. In non-primacy States, no notice is needed, and the EPA is required to issue an order or commence a civil action whenever there is non-compliance by a public water system.

Administrative orders are available in lieu of civil actions, but in primacy States may only be issued after consultation with the States and public hearing.

Civil penalties of up to $25,000 per day are available.

Section 104—Public Notification

The bill mandates EPA to prescribe by rule within 12 months the form, manner and frequency of the notice. All notices must be no less than on an annual basis. EPA is also given authority to differentiate between serious and non-serious violations for purpose of notice. Serious violations must be noticed in a newspaper of general circulation every 3 months.

Section 105—Variances

Variances are available from the BAT standard depending on certain factors. A schedule of compliance is prescribed at the time the variance is granted.

Section 106—Exemptions

The bill adds a possible extension of 3 years to comply with an exemption schedule if certain criteria are met. Systems with less than 500 service connections can possibly gain an additional 2 years if financial assistance is needed.

Section 107—Tampering with Public Water Systems

This section provides for criminal penalties for persons who introduce a contaminant into, or otherwise tamper with, a public water system, with the intention of harming persons. Tampering can result in a $50,000 fine and 5-year sentence, attempted tampering a $20,000 fine and a 3-year sentence.

Title II

Section 201—UIC

The injection of hazardous wastes above or into drinking water sources would be banned except that injection of contaminated groundwater into the aquifer from which it was withdrawn may be allowed pursuant to RCRA or Superfund criteria and procedures. The prohibition takes effect 6 months after enactment except for States with identical requirements.

The bill requires EPA to revise UIC regulations to require monitoring of underground drinking water sources down gradient from class I injection wells. An EPA-State inventory of hazardous waste wells is also mandated.

Section 202—Enforcement of UIC

The bill allows EPA, 30 days after notice of violation and after notice to the State, to issue an order enforcing a UIC requirement if the State does not. Civil penalties of up to $25,000 per day are available.

Section 203—State Plans

The bill requires States to develop and adopt plans to protect underground sources of drinking water from contamination that may adversely affect the health of persons. These plans must be developed within 18 months and meet five listed criteria to be approved by the EPA. The State plan must:

(1) Specify a lead agency for implementing the plan;

(2) identify the different aquifers to be protected and sources of contamination;

(3) contain implementing regulations including best management practices (BMPs);

(4) provide for alternative drinking water supplies if needed; and

(5) list areas designated under section 1424(e) as containing sole or principal source aquifers.

Oil and gas exploration States must have provisions for protection from contamination from brine disposal. A State may provide special protection for sole source aquifers. Sources of drinking water to be protected are broadly defined.

State plans initially rejected may be revised and resubmitted. States failing to have plans approved within the time limitations cannot exercise their section 1422 State UIC enforcement responsibility. The State will also be subject to citizen suits under section 1449.

Each State is eligible to receive Federal grants for 50 percent of the costs of development and implementation of the approved plan.

REAGAN ADMINISTRATION EFFORTS AT WEAPONIZING SPACE

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to, once again, urge my colleagues to repudiate efforts by the Reagan administration aimed at weaponizing space. An arms race in space will add nothing to U.S. security interests and only serve to undermine current and future arms control agreements. Beyond this, such a race will be fabulously expensive. It makes much more sense for the United States and the Soviet Union to immediately begin negotiations aimed at banning all space weapons—so that we may prevent the proliferation of these new and destabilizing weapons systems.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. Carl Sagan, the noted astronomer and Cornell University professor, has been an active and vocal critic of the so-called star wars strategy since its inception. In an excellent interview, which appeared in the May-June edition of Common Cause magazine, Dr. Sagan discusses at length the strategic, economic, and moral drawbacks of a space weapons race. For the benefit of my colleagues, I submit the interview in the RECORD.

THE SKY IS NOT THE LIMIT

(By Julie Kosterlitz and Deborah Baldwin)

When President Reagan addressed the nation on television in March of last year, he surprised many Americans—and some of his own advisers—with an unexpected proposal to launch a radically new generation of weapons based in outer space.

Among those caught off guard was Dr. Carl Sagan.

An astronomer and Cornell University professor best known for his popular public television series, "Cosmos," Sagan was in a hospital bed recovering from surgery for a burst appendix at the time.

"The first thing I saw coming out of this haze was the president's 'star wars' speech," Sagan recalls.

Having played a leading role in the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Mariner, Viking and Voyager expeditions to the planets, Sagan was no stranger to matters extraterrestrial. He also knew that the technology required to implement the president's plan is currently not much more than a gleam in scientists' eyes, and that despite the billions of dollars required to develop such a system, it might never work as planned.

It wasn't only the difficulty, costliness and uncertainty of the proposal that concerned him and a growing number of scientists and arms control experts, but the belief that it would increase the prospects for a nuclear war.

Sagan's fear was heightened by the fact that, at the time of the president's speech, he and a group of other scientists were nearing completion of two years' worth of studies that culminated in the discovery of the "nuclear winter."

In the aftermath of a nuclear exchange, they learned, the fine particle put into the earth's atmosphere (partly as a result of burning cities) would darken and cool the earth so much that agriculture would be destroyed and the chances of human survival drastically reduced.

Sagan decided it was time for action. A month before the president's speech, he and IBM physicist Dr. Richard Garwin had drafted a petition urging nations capable of launching their own satellites or space craft to negotiate a treaty banning all weapons from space and prohibiting destruction of satellites, which play a key role in peacetime data gathering and military awareness. "The treaty now seemed much more important," Sagan recalls. Still in the hospital, he worked with his wife, Ann Druyan, coauthor of the "Cosmos" series, to gather more signatures for the petition and to cable the petition to heads of the "spacefaring" nations.

The petition, eventually signed by nearly 40 scientists—many of them leaders in military and civilian space development—spurred an exchange of letters with the late Soviet President Yuri Andropov. The Soviets subsequently unveiled a proposal to the United Nations calling for a comprehensive ban of all anti-satellite and space-based weapons. The Reagan administration, which has not officially responded to the Soviets, has suggested it is not likely to take up the proposal.

Instead, the president wants to push ahead with an ambitious, long-term program to develop a set of space-based weapons designed to destroy ballistic missiles before they reach their targets on earth. (Ballistic missiles fly in an arc-like path under the influence of gravity after a brief period of powered flight.)

Supporters argue that space weapons would allow the superpowers to reshape their defense thinking. Under the present, uneasy balance of power, the strategy to avoid nuclear war is based primarily on the assumption that if either superpower strikes first, the other will launch a devastating counter-attack—thus the phrase "mutual assured destruction." Wouldn't the world be safer, supporters argue, if each side knew no ballistic missile would ever reach its target because it would be knocked down in flight?

Sagan, however, argues that the development of space weapons would have the opposite of the intended effect. Rather than provide a defense, space weapons would threaten the side that fell behind in the space race, thereby adding to the temptation to strike first before the system was in place.

Moreover, he believes the development of space weaponry would set back arms control efforts because, while the new system could never stop all incoming missiles, it would give the side with the technological edge a dangerous illusion of invulnerability. At the same time the new system would tempt opponents to increase their arms buildup in an effort to thwart the system.

Meanwhile, concern is mounting over testing of a U.S. weapon designed to destroy Soviet satellites. Sagan and other critics charge that the weapon, which is considered far more sophisticated than any existing Soviet anti-satellite weapon, would not only heighten tensions between the superpowers, but also represent the first step toward escalating the arms race in space.

In a recent interview with Common Cause Magazine, Sagan explained why he is working to stop the arms race in outer space. He urged citizens not to leave the debate to the so-called experts, but to "dig into the guts of the issue." Below are excerpts from that interview.

CC: Most Americans know you as the man who leads guided tours of the cosmos on television. How did you get involved in the issue of nuclear arms control?

Sagan: Two things happened. One was the March 23, 1983 speech by the president. I could not believe what I was hearing.

The other thing was the accidental discovery of the "nuclear winter." Suddenly, we had stumbled on the likelihood that nuclear war—as bad as we knew it would be—would be much worse than anyone had said.

CC: Why the sudden emphasis on space-based defense at this time?

Sagan: The president was captivated by it. It's very clear that his speech on March 23rd was not checked with critical people in his own administration. They were caught completely off guard. He hasn't bothered to check on its technical feasibility or get any input from people with different opinions.

CC: For a lot of people, talk about war in outer space conjures up images of Flash Gordon or Luke Skywalker. What are we really talking about?

Sagan: Different people are talking about different things, and that's part of the confusion. What the president was talking about in his speech was a kind of impenetrable shield over the United States which would protect it from ballistic missiles with enormously—one might even say "fantastically"—high accuracy. But what the actual technical people of the Department of Defense are talking about is quite different. The technical people are talking about a defense system that would shoot down some percentage of incoming warheads. That is very different from an impenetrable shield. Being able to shoot down everything and being able to shoot down 50 percent or less makes all the difference in the world.

CC: What concerns you about the space-based missile defense?

Sagan: First of all there almost certainly will not be an impenetrable shield or anything like that. Secondly, it is ruinously expensive. It would cost around a trillion dollars. And that is of some relevance in a time of galloping national budget deficits.

Thirdly, these systems will abrogate many if not most of the few strategic treaties that the superpowers have solemnly entered into. Take the bomb driven X-ray laser, for example. This is a scheme of Edward Teller and his associates at the Lawrence Livermore Laboratory which would have a set of X-ray lasers in space; each one of them, in order to work, to shoot down one missile, would require the explosion of a single one-megaton hydrogen bomb. Such a device would simultaneously abrogate the outer space treaty, the limited test ban treaty and the antiballistic missile treaty.

Finally, if there were such a shield in place over the United States and not over the Soviet Union, they could do nothing to intimidate us and we could do anything to intimidate them. And since their national survival would be at stake, their one obvious response would be a preemptive nuclear strike against the United States to prevent such systems from being put into place.

CC: So you think a space-based weapons system is a serious provocation?

Sagan: It is the most dangerous provocation—much more dangerous than putting Pershing IIs or cruise missiles in Europe. This system, if deployed, says that the entire Soviet strategic arsenal is now useless.

CC: Yet the president has stressed this is an attempt not to gain superiority, but to eliminate the threat of nuclear war. It sounds appealing.

Sagan: Imagine that there was a science fiction kind of impenetrable shield put over both the United States and the Soviet Union. Between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. there could be no objection. It suddenly makes both countries safe from intimidation by the other.

But the moment that shield is anything less than perfect, or anything less than simultaneous, we have an extremely different situation. Imagine a system which is only 50 percent impermeable—50 percent of the missiles or warheads from the other side get through. Now, suppose the Soviets wish to be guaranteed the ability to inflict a certain amount of damage on the United States. What is their response to the certain knowledge that a U.S. system is 50 percent impermeable? It's to double their strategic forces. They just shoot twice as many warheads. Half of them will be knocked down, and the remaining half will administer the damage they wished to administer.

CC: Right now the superpowers' strategy to prevent nuclear war is based on the theory of "mutual assured destruction." The only thing that keeps one side from attacking the other is that each knows it would be destroyed if it launched an attack. Neither side is equipped to defend itself—they are only equipped to retaliate after the damage has already been done. President Reagan says his plan to shoot down missiles in flight, from outer space, is a better way to prevent nuclear war, since it would allow both sides to defend themselves before the damage is done.

Sagan: Anything short of an impermeable system is significantly more dangerous than no defense system whatever.

CC: You seem to doubt our ability to ever build that perfect shield.

Sagan: That is an extremely generous way to put it. The undersecretary of defense for research and engineering, Dr. Richard DeLauer, says he believes it would require the equivalent effort of eight or nine Manhattan [nuclear bomb development] projects, or nine Apollo [moon landing] projects—each on a different phase of the technology.

CC: In terms of the time and cost involved?

Sagan: And in terms of difficulty.

CC: But the Apollo project did succeed. Couldn't this also?

Sagan: What you have to remember is that the moon didn't fight back. It was not attempting at each step of the development of the Apollo program to design ways to foil our attempt to land a human being on it.

The Soviets would be foolish not to try to take what countermeasures they can against such a system. And when you look at it even casually, it turns out that there are an enormous number of countermeasures they could take, that are very effective and that are cheaper than the space-based ballistic missile defense system itself.

CC: You're saying we would come out as losers both economically and strategically. But we wouldn't even have to worry about the Soviets' countermeasures, since the president has offered to make whatever space-based missile defense we design available to them. He says that if both sides have this system in place, both sides would be so well defended there would be no temptation for either to launch an attack. In fact, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger repeated the offer recently on national television.

Sagan: He can't be serious. There are computer systems fundamental to the success of this system that would help track hundreds of thousands or millions of warheads, decoys and penetration aids (devices designed to help penetrate the enemy's defense). If he were serious about sharing the system with the Soviets, he would immediately be in favor of shipping our most powerful computers to the Soviet Union. Instead, he has been at the forefront of opposing high technology transfer to the Soviet bloc. He can't have it both ways.

CC: Some scientists have argued that even if the system is not perfect, it would make it impossible for the Soviets to plan an effective attack. They would have no way of knowing how effective our system was, how many missiles could get through and which targets they could be sure of hitting. With all those uncertainties, the argument goes, they would be discouraged from launching an attack at all.

Sagan: I don't think that makes any sense. The first, obvious Soviet response is, as I mentioned, simply to increase their attacking forces to compensate for the U.S. defense system. But, of course, they can't be sure how effective our defense would be. So to be conservative, they have to plan for the worst case, which means they have to increase their attacking forces by a large factor. So in the case of a nuclear war, more damage would probably be inflicted on the U.S. than if there were no space-based ballistic missile defense system.

CC: Do you really think the defense strategists are blind to these risks?

Sagan: You're starting with the assumption that the people who are proposing this have thought it through. . . .

CC: Your scientific expertise is well known. But isn't nuclear arms control primarily a political issue?

Sagan: Well, most of the issues we have been talking about are largely scientific and technological. But as Aristotle said; "man is a political animal," and this is a democracy—people are supposed to take seriously their responsibilities as citizens. I have children, I hope to have grandchildren. I am personally very concerned that we are foolishly moving toward a world in which everybody is at much greater risk than they are today, and things are plenty bad enough today.

CC: So what do you recommend?

Sagan: I recommend massive, bilateral, verifiable, safe reduction in the strategic arsenals of both nations.

CC: But even reducing these arsenals doesn't get rid of the threat of nuclear war.

Sagan: You can't disinvent nuclear weapons. Both superpowers know how to make them, and lots of other countries do as well.

CC: You're saying there's no technological solution to the threat of nuclear war?

Sagan: It is not a question of gadgets, it's a question of people. The solution is political—it's in the human heart.

Since 1946 there has been a steady proliferation of the gadgets of the strategic arms race and it has not helped at all. We do have to learn from experience.

CC: Having exchanged letters with the late Soviet President Yuri Andropov, you've had a little more experience with the Soviets than the rest of us. What is your sense of where the Soviets stand on the whole issue of space weapons?

Sagan: The Soviet Union has put forward to the United Nations a proposal to ban anti-satellite weapons. The United States has not even bothered to respond.

CC: But don't the Soviets already have a weapon system to destroy satellites?

Sagan: They have a very rudimentary one. The first version worked, by any definition, only about 50 percent of the time, and the new, improved version works about zero percent of the time.

CC: Do you think the Soviet proposal to ban anti-satellite weapons is an entirely sincere gesture?

Sagan: If any nation wants to propose backing off from a weapons system that it has, or is working on, for propaganda advantage, their bluff should be called.

CC: How could we trust the Soviets not to go ahead developing their weapons?

Sagan: It's not a matter of trusting. It's a matter of surveillance. After all, this administration is imagining a system that is able to track one million decoys and penetration aids and warheads, all in the skies at the same moment. If they think that's possible, how can they maintain that you cannot put up in space a surveillance system which can monitor the testing of a few anti-satellite weapons? They can't have it both ways.

CC: What is the danger of having weapons that destroy satellites?

Sagan: Between 75 and 90 percent of U.S. military communications traffic goes via satellite. The Soviet reliance on satellite military communication is much less. The existence of an anti-satellite capability on both sides threatens U.S. military communications much more than Soviet communications. . . .

Also, you make it more likely to initiate war which is triggered by miscalculation, misunderstanding. Let's say, for example, a U.S. military reconnaissance satellite fails mysteriously over the Soviet Union. In a world without anti-satellite weapons, we are likely to think of that failure as mechanical or electronic. But if we are at a time when the Soviet Union has a well developed anti-satellite capability, we are likely to take very seriously the possibility that the satellite went out because of hostile action. That could be erroneous, but nevertheless would dangerously raise the level of tension. The same is true, of course, about a Soviet satellite failure.

CC: Some scientists argue that if we had weapons in space we might be able to wage a sort of "clean" war, fought by mechanical proxy way out there. We could knock out each other's satellites, for example, and still contain the hostilities before they spread to earth. Outer space could serve as kind of a buffer zone. What do you think of that argument?

Sagan: It's tremendously foolish and unrealistic. Imagine that the Soviets wake up one day to find that all of their satellites whose job it was to detect the launch of U.S. strategic missiles have failed. What are they to think?

It could not have been accidental because there are too many of them to all fail at once. So it must be due to U.S. action. Why would the United States wish to blind their capability? Only because the U.S. wanted to launch a first strike. What is the Soviet response? To launch their first strike first—"use them or lose them." I don't see any way in which this confines things to space; in fact, it brings them very precipitously down to earth.

CC: Some critics of the "star wars" approach say we are rapidly approaching a point of no return. Why is that?

Sagan: Because of the technological momentum and because each side is quite justifiably scared to death of the other. If one side has a real sense that the other has gotten substantially ahead, they have to move ahead also or else prevent it. And as soon as you spend lots of money you have lots of careers dependent on the development of this system. Then there's concern over corporate profits, wages of workers, the prestige of all the officials who have come out in favor of this system. It gets very hard to stop.

CC: Most of the issues we've been discussing seem to require a lot of scientific and technological expertise. How is the average person supposed to make any sense of it?

Sagan: People need to dig into the guts of the issue. It's not that hard. They could start by reading Space-Based Missile Defense (Union of Concerned Scientists, Cambridge, Mass., 1984) or the recent report by the U.S. Congress' Office of Technology Assessment.

CC: Let's say we defer military use of outer space. What are some of the nonmilitary projects you'd like to see taking place in outer space?

Sagan: I'd like to see the United States continue its historic exploration of the universe. It has been the world leader but has significantly backed off in this decade. For example, in 1986 there will be the close passage by the earth of Halley's Comet. There will be a joint Soviet-French mission to observe it, and a mission from the European Space Agency, which is comprised of 10 or 12 European nations, and a mission from the Japanese Space Agency. The United States will not be represented. This was considered to be a low priority activity. I'd like to see missions to comets, asteroids, Mars, Titan (a moon of Saturn)—a full exploration of our neighborhood in space. It can be done for about 1 percent of the "star wars" cost and might well provide an aperture to a very promising future for the human species.

There is an enormous amount that can be done in the utilization of the space environment that is not being done. Already weather satellites, communications satellites and earth resources satellites have proved economically extremely beneficial. And military reconnaissance satellites are tremendously stabilizing. They give each side some breathing room because they provide information about the intentions of the other superpower. They're worth their weight in gold.

CC: You've been involved in the search for life on other planets. Have you ever suspected that there were other societies out there that destroyed themselves?

Sagan: Sure. This has been a factor in the equation used to analyze the likelihood of life on the planets of other stars since the late '50s. If technical civilizations tend generally to destroy themselves once they reach our level of technological adolescence, there might be very few civilizations out there at any given time. If a small fraction of such societies manage to live with weapons of mass destruction, the number of civilizations might be very large.

CC: Do you think that our civilization is going to survive the next century?

Sagan: Prophesy is a lost art. What's clear is, it's up to us. Humans made this mess, and humans can get out of this mess. But not if we just stick to the conventional modes of thinking.

CC: How should we reorient our thinking? What are we missing?

Sagan: Take a look at the development of "identification horizons" in the history of the human species. We start out identifying with small family groups and grow to identify with tribes. Then our fundamental concern is about the tribe. Next we grow into larger, more settled agricultural groupings and city-states, then small nations, larger nations and then the present situation, in which the average person on the earth owes his or her primary identification to a group of hundreds of millions of people or more. As that happens the amount of internal conflict goes down because people realize those other guys are just like us.

The key question is, will our identification horizons expand to include everyone on the planet before we destroy ourselves?

CC: Has being an astronomer and astrophysicist affected your view of arms control?

Sagan: Certainly. When you look at the earth from space and see it as a fragile, tiny planet, tremendously sensitive to the depredations of its inhabitants, it's impossible not to think that what we are doing is foolish.

There are no national boundaries visible when you look at the earth from space. It's a planet—all one place. All the beings on it are mutually dependent, like living on a lifeboat. Whatever the causes that divide, us, the earth will be here a thousand—a million—years from now. The question is, will we?●

COMMEMORATION OF THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF "BLOODY THURSDAY"

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on the 5th of July, members of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and their families will be gathering at Pecks Park in San Pedro, CA, for the 50th anniversary of "Bloody Thursday" and to honor those members who died on that tragic date.

The history of the events leading up to that day in 1934 is one of constant struggle, and of triumph against overwhelming odds. Prior to 1934, labor relations on the waterfront were not those of the employer and employee, as we know them today. The men were unorganized and members of the employer controlled blue book union. Longshoremen were hired on the docks, and worked backbreaking hours, under nonexistent safety standards.

The few that did get the chance to work were sometimes required to work up to 30 hours at a time without sleep. Kickbacks were paid to the hiring boss to get even this type of labor. A longshoremen's weekly average pay in San Pedro was $10.45. The men were largely first or second generation imigrants who could work hard, but not under such conditions.

In June 1933, a movement was started to organize a coastwide rank and file controlled union. After months of organizing, on May 9, 1934, the longshoremen of the west coast all struck for recognition of their union, the rank and file control of hiring, a wage increase, and a general improvement of conditions. Violence broke out up and down the coast as employers sought to end the strike.

On May 15, 1934, the first serious clash occurred when 300 strikers marched down the Wilmington-San Pedro Road to the docks, where a ship was being unloaded by nonunion labor. They were met by hundreds of police, armed guards, and strike breakers. Soon violence broke out and two longshoremen, Richard Parker and John Knudson of San Pedro, were killed.

The shootings and beatings escalated up and down the coast and culminated with the Bloody Thursday massacre in San Francisco. The mayor of San Francisco had stated that the port would be opened in the morning on Thursday, July 5, 1934. Those on the picketlines were met by nearly 8,000 policemen and a riot began that resulted in two more longshoremen being killed and over 100 hospitalized.

Many innocent bystanders were injured in the melee; and in support of the longshoremen, the citizens of San Francisco staged a 3-day general strike. This action forced a settlement through the President's Mediation Board and the majority of the union's demand were met.

So on July 5, we will remember Richard Parker and John Knudson of San Pedro who gave their lives along with others in the effort to improve working conditions and allow hardworking men the chance to walk with dignity. My wife, Lee, joins with me in honoring those men, and the struggles of the ILWU in establishing their organization.●

TRIBUTE TO SANILAC COUNTY ON 150 YEARS OF PROGRESS

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise before this distinguished body to pay tribute to Sanilac County, one of the most productive and beautiful counties in Michigan. Next week the people of Sanilac County, which I have the honor of representing, will celebrate the sesquicentennial of the county's settlement. I ask my colleagues to join in a salute to this county, its proud heritage and its hardworking and friendly people.

The story of Sanilac County begins in what is now the city of Lexington. At this pleasant site on the shores of Lake Huron, the first white settlement was established in 1834. Prior to this, the area was inhabited by the Sauk Indians who left the only petroglyphs—carvings or inscriptions—in the State of Michigan.

Many of the early settlers in Sanilac County during the early 19th century came from English Canada. They had been banished to the United States after the 1837 rebellion against the British colonial government. Although these settlers expected a harsh and barren land, they were surprised to find rich soil and a healthy climate conducive to growing crops that today make Sanilac County one of Michigan's top grain producing counties.

Sanilac County received its charter after a special act of the Michigan Legislature of 1848. By 1881, all 26 townships were organized. Peter H. Benedict was the first representative in the State legislature from this county, having been elected in 1852.

The settlers found a country that was blessed with pine of the finest quality spurring a bustling shinglemaking trade. Many of the beautiful farms in Sanilac County today were purchased by the original settlers with proceeds from the shinglemaking of their own hands.

However, the history of Sanilac County is not without disaster. The great fires of 1871 and 1881 devastated the county, while the Great Lakes storm of 1913 signaled the death knell for many Lake Huron ports.

Nonetheless, the children of the hearty peoples who settled Sanilac County survived the trying times, cleared the land and put to good use the abundance of opportunities the soil afforded them. Sanilac County has the distinction of being the top dairy producing county in Michigan and one of the largest producing counties for the agricultural commodities that feed the world.

During the week of July 4–8, Sanilac County will celebrate the historic sesquicentennial with a spectacular parade on the Fourth and fireworks to commemorate Independence Day. The celebration will be capped July 8 by the blessing of the fleet at the Lexington Harbor. The entire week will be highlighted by a new history of Sanilac County—the first comprehensive documentation of the county's background written since 1884. And last, but not least, Sanilac County will proudly fly its new flag which depicts the richness of the county with the symbols of the lighthouse, boats, the dairy cow, wheat, the Indian bowman, and the hunter, and the fisherman and the pioneer.

I want to personally express my good wishes to all the people of Sanilac County, and commend the many dedicated civic groups and individuals involved in the observation of Sanilac County's rich heritage and confident future.●

NATIONAL SAFETY GOALS PROMOTED

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, the 98th Congress has cleared and sent to the President legislation promoting two very important national safety goals—legislation of which I am extremely proud to have been an original cosponsor, and the passage of which I greet with nothing short of enthusiasm. I am referring to the recent House/Senate approval of child passenger safety seat incentive grants/uniform minimum drinking age legislation.

Passage of this legislation will achieve two very important goals: First, improving and increasing the proper use of child restraint devices [CRD's] nationwide; and second, reducing the disproportionate number of alcohol-related traffic deaths among American teenagers because of varying legal minimum drinking ages across the country.

As the sponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 23, the first resolution calling on all States to raise their drinking age to 21—introduced some 19 months ago during the lameduck session of the 97th Congress. I am delighted that we have sent a "21" bill to the President for signature that received the overwhelming approval of the House and Senate, and which has the endorsement of both the President and Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole. The Uniform Minimum Drinking Age Act Amendment—which I cosponsored with Public Works and Transportation Chairman JIM HOWARD, along with Messrs. ANDERSON, CLINGER, BARNES, LANTOS, and PORTER—will achieve a uniform drinking age of 21 by withholding a small percentage of highway construction funding from States which do not adopt a "21 law" by fiscal year 1987.

The CRD provisions of this legislation will earmark States section 402 highway funding for child passenger seat distribution, enforcement, public information, and education programs—all of which are vitally needed, in light of the fact that automobile crashes are the leading cause of death for American children.

As has been said during debate on both of these subjects, it is rare that we as legislators are given the opportunity to vote on measures which will save lives. With approximately 900 children under the age of 5 being killed annually while riding in passenger vehicles, and with 5,000 teenagers losing their lives each year from drunken driving, what worthier bill could we, Members of the 98th Congress, clear for President Reagan's signature than this measure?

My career prior to serving in the Congress was in education, and so I came to Washington with frequent visions of the faces of the young people in south-central Pennsylvania—some of whom lost their tender young lives in senseless traffic crashes, many of them as a result of heady encounters at the wheel following carousing in a State south of our border which then had a lower drinking age.

I want to protect our future—our most valuable and precious natural resource—from senseless mortality rates and from crippling injuries; thus, I applaud the work of the 98th Congress on enacting legislation addressing the critical need for child restraint device usage and a legal minimum drinking age of 21 nationwide.

I would add that I am also pleased with amendments which the Senate included to combat drugged driving and improve law enforcement in alcohol-related automobile accidents involving older drunken drivers.●

NATIONAL DIABETES MONTH

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times," wrote Charles Dickens. Doctors or parents of adolescents with diabetes might change the refrain to, "It was the worst of times, it was the very worst of times."

A diabetic adolescent must cope with the restrictive requirements necessary to control diabetes while simultaneously coping with simply being an adolescent. Awareness of complications associated with diabetes and statistics documenting a shorter life span for diabetics, compound the difficulties of adjusting to those sensitive adolescent years. We can well understand the problem by simply reflecting upon those statistics.

Diabetes, as the third leading cause of death in the United States, afflicts 12 million Americans, claiming 300,000 lives annually—almost 1,000 lives every day. Diabetes is one of the four major risk factors for cardiovascular disease, is responsible for 20 to 25 percent of all cases of kidney failure, causes almost 50 percent of foot and leg amputations among adults and is the leading cause of new blindness. Infants born to mothers with diabetes experience a disproportionately high rate of mortality, congenital malformations, respiratory distress, prematurity, and other serious medical problems.

It is estimated that diabetes costs our Nation over $10 billion annually.

That's the bad news that gives adolescents, and indeed all diabetics a "worst of times" experience. But there is good news. Research has produced dramatic improvements in the testing and caring for diabetes and, indeed, has given rise to the expectation that a cure may be found in the near future.

Scientists supported by funding from the National Institutes of Health [NIH] have made major contributions in diabetic research.

It has been demonstrated that several commom human viruses are capable of producing diabetes in laboratory animals, thereby possibly leading to the development of a preventive diabetes vaccine. Genetic markers for diabetes have been identified, which may lead to identifying high-risk candidates before they develop diabetes and its complications. Researchers have determined that there is a causal relationship between lack of control—fluctuation in blood sugar levels—and the onset of diabetes' complications. A new clinical trial may demonstrate whether adequate control will prevent or mitigate the devastating and debilitating complications of diabetes. The pregnant diabetic has the benefit of research demonstrating that meticulous control of her blood sugar and fetal monitoring can reduce most of the complications of a diabetic pregnancy to a rate comparable to those of nondiabetic pregnancies.

Treatment of the diabetic has also advanced during the past decade. Many diabetics are wearing an external miniature battery-powered pump which feeds a continuous supply of insulin to the body. The wearers of this device need no insulin injections and are able to maintain almost normal blood sugar levels. Human insulin, produced through recombinant DNA was approved this year for use by the Food and Drug Administration. Ultimately human insulin will provide an unlimited supply of cheaper, purer, and more compatible insulin. In addition, new tests and more accurate techniques to monitor blood sugar control have been developed.

Perhaps the most exciting area of diabetic research—one that speaks to a cure for diabetics—is pancreatic islet cell transplantation. The islets contain the pancreas gland's insulin-producing beta cells. The successful transplantation of these cells into the diabetic may actually reverse diabetes in the body. To date, researchers have successfully transplanted clusters of the insulin-producing cells from one animal species to another. Scientists are now working to overcome problems of rejection of islet cells and to iolate these cells from large animals and man, as well as purifying islet tissue.

Such advances are, in large part, the direct result of diabetes research at the National Institutes of Health. National Diabetes Month will call attention to the nature of this disease and the advances made in combating its negative effects.

As a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 307, I urge my colleagues to approve this resolution which would designate the month of November 1984 as "National Diabetes Month." All diabetics deserve to see their life as the "best of times."●

A TRIBUTE TO LT. COMDR. CHRISTOPHER A. KIEFER, USCG, UPON HIS RETIREMENT

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on July 25, the Coast Guard will honor Lt. Comdr. Christopher A. Kiefer on his retirement after 20 years of service to his country. The retirement ceremonies will take place at the Terminal Island Coast Guard Base.

Chris enlisted in the U.S. Coast Guard on July 21, 1964, at Green Bay, WI. After completing training at Cape May, NJ, and at the electrician mate school in Groton, CT, he was assigned aboard the USCGC Coos Bay, and then the USCGC Humboldt, both weather cutters out of Portland, ME. Subsequent assignment included the Nantucket Lightship; the Buoy Depot in Bristol, RI, the Loran Station on St. Paul Island in the Bering Sea for 14 months of isolated duty; the Dry Tortugas Light House; and the St. Petersburg Air Station in Florida. Chief Electrician's Mate Kiefer then decided to further his career by applying for admission to the Officer Candidate School.

In February 1971, Chris graduated from Officer Candidate School, and was commissioned an ensign in the U.S. Coast Guard. His first commissioned duty was as engineering watch officer on the USCGC Hamilton. Other assignments have included two tours with the Marine Inspection Office Los Angeles-Long Beach, the icebreaker USCGC Burton Island, and in the Industry Training Program, where he specialized in offshore oil drilling operations. His 19 months aboard the Burton Island included two deployments to arctic waters and one to the Antarctic.

His last duty assignment before retirement brought Lieutenant Commander Kiefer back to Long Beach to the 11th Coast Guard District Staff as Branch Chief, Commercial Vessel Safety, in charge of commercial vessel inspections, licensing, and documentation. He was instrumental in the consolidation of the vessel documentation and personnel licensing functions, resulting in considerable saving of tax dollars.

Chris Kiefer is a member of many professional organizations, including the Propeller Club; the Society of Port Engineers, and the Binnacle and Bilge Clubs of LA/LB Harbor. He has been active in the maritime committees of the Long Beach Chamber of Commerce.

My wife, Lee, joins with me in congratulating Lt. Comdr. Christopher Kiefer for many years of exemplary service, and we wish him, his wife Diana and their three children, Kimberley Anne, Eric Christoper, and Daniel, all the best in years to come.●

EMPLOYEE OWNERSHIP AND BETTER LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

HON. RUSSELL B. LONG

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. LONG. Mr. President, on June 6 it was my privilege to have an opportunity to address the second annual National Labor-Management Conference sponsored by the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, the U.S. Department of Labor and, the National Association of Area Labor-Management Committees. I was asked to speak to this distinguished group on the subject of gain sharing.

This conference is proving to be a valuable source of information for those interested in the promotion of better labor-management relations. I am convinced that labor and management must continue to work at mastering the skills that are being taught by experts such as those who presented the 31 diverse work sessions that comprised this excellent program.

I congratulate the sponsors of this excellent conference and urge my colleagues to lend their support to efforts such as this that are specifically designed to foster better labor-management relations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my remarks to this conference appear in the appendix of the RECORD:

ADDRESS OF THE SECOND NATIONAL LABOR-MANAGEMENT CONFERENCE

I was invited here today to talk to you about gainsharing. I know that by now you have heard a bit about the subject. And certainly there are people on the program who know more about the topic than I do.

Over the past decade, social scientists have been combing through the American workplace looking for the secret key to unlock productivity, profitability and better labor-management relations. The jury is still out on whether they've found the answer, but let me share with you a few of the clues—and a few conclusions that I think we can draw from those clues.

For example, in 1977, a University of Michigan team found that 75 percent of Americans would prefer to go on working even if they could live comfortably without working for the rest of their lives. This was a substantial increase over a similar poll taken 7 years earlier.

Other studies indicate that not only are Americans committed to work, they also have a great deal of control over how hard they work and over the quality of the work performed.

In 1982, a study for the Public Agenda Foundation explored the assumptions that individuals make about what they will give to the job and what is expected in return.

Seventy-eight percent of those surveyed indicated that they have an "inner need" to do the very best job they can regardless of pay. And 88 percent responded that they had control over the quality of the work they performed.

Too few policymakers realize just how much control working Americans have over whether they will meet only the minimum requirements of the job—or whether they will contribute that extra effort that makes the difference between mere adequacy and competitive excellence.

The most interesting—and the most alarming—finding had to do with whether workers were using this workplace freedom to fulfill their inner need to do the very best job they could do. Only 16 percent said that they were. The rest indicated that they could improve their effectiveness. And many claimed that they could be twice as effective.

The question for all of us is why aren't they being more effective?

One clue is found in a 1980 Gallup study which asked workers who they thought would benefit from improvements in their productivity. Only 9 percent felt that they, the workers, would benefit. Most assumed that the beneficiaries would be others—consumers, stockholders, or management.

This is consistent with a 1981 Harris survey which revealed that 73 percent of working Americans believe that the motivation to work hard is not as strong today as it was a decade ago. Seventy-eight percent felt that people take less pride in their work than they did 10 years ago.

There are some who argue that such findings are proof that the work ethic is eroding. How else, they argue, can you explain these findings. I disagree. The evidence indicates that the work ethic is strong and growing stronger.

I think it signifies something more basic than that—and something that can be changed with the help of those of you here in this room today.

To me it signifies that more and more people are doubting that hard work will bring the personal rewards that they have a right to expect.

The problem lies in our management systems and in our systems of incentives and rewards—both psychological and financial.

For example, the Gallup study mentioned earlier also asked people whether they would work harder and do a better job if they were involved in decisions relating to their work. An overwhelming 84 percent said that they would.

Similarly, a New York University professor reviewed 103 experiments designed to test whether improved incentive systems would lead to higher individual productivity—incentive systems such as more money and greater control over one's work. It did in 85 of the experiments.

There are many ways to increase worker interest, involvement and productivity. More and more companies are beginning to appreciate the benefits available through managment systems designed to allow workers to have more control over their work. For example, in 1982 the New York Stock Exchange surveyed management's attitude toward participative management.

Eighty-two percent of those managers surveyed in corporations with 500 or more employees consider participative management to be a promising new approach. Only 3 percent saw it as a fad destined to disappear.

A 1983 survey for the American Business Conference found a particularly strong link between participative managment and increased productivity and profits. In fact, reliance on such management techniques has now become a chief characteristic of highly successful mid-sized firms.

Ladies and gentlemen—the potential is there. Within the American workforce is an untapped reservoir of improved performance and increased productivity. Americans appear to be willing to work harder—and to work smarter—in order to turn out a higher quality service or product. Indeed, their very self esteem demands that they do not less. The challenge facing policymakers is how to tap that potential.

No single approach will work for every firm or every industry. What is needed is a set of guiding principles that will create a workplace environment in which that high productive potential is planned for.

Productivity should be a central goal and a key part of any form's long-range strategy. Companies willing to plan for the long haul should offer real incentives—both financial and non financial. Those incentives should be offered both to workers and to managers—and should include incentives that encourage cooperation and constructive criticism at every level of the organization.

Due to their decision-making role, top management must be the initiator in making productivity growth a central focus of strategic planning for the company. The union should be included as a crucial partner in the planning and implementation of all productivity programs. That may require a change of attitude on the part of both management and union leaders.

Yet a new spirit of accommodation is emerging from a realization by both management and labor that the stakes are high. American industry is threatened on many fronts—markets and jobs are on the line.

There is much that can be done—particularly in the area of gain sharing—that can benefit everyone involved. And I urge you to get on with it because there is much that needs to be done soon.

For example, a recent study indicates that since 1957 the percentage of workers who see their job as a source of personal fulfillment decreased from 50 percent to 25 percent.

Another study found that 60 percent of the workforce would prefer another job—up from 44 percent in 1969. A 1980 study found that 27 percent would not even buy the products they themselves make.

There are some for whom the term "increased productivity" is still regarded as a code word for speedups that benefit management while threatening job security. Yet that need not be the case.

What it should mean—and what it can mean—is a more efficient and a more fulfilling way to get things done. There are a number of ways that gain-sharing programs can be structured; and any number of ways that such programs can be tailored to meet any company's particular needs.

For today, I will limit myself to employee stock ownership—the so-called ESOP arrangements—because that is the area of my experience.

This year, companies are able to claim an ESOP tax credit equal to one-half of one percent of payroll—provided those tax savings are used to buy stock for employees. This is known as the tax credit ESOP—or the PAYSOP for short. I was the author of that proposition.

An even more popular type of plan is the leveraged ESOP under which a company is encouraged to finance its operations in such a way that employees own stock in the company. I am pushing legislation to make it even more popular.

The incentives for ESOP financing are substantial. If you are not familiar with them, I suggest that you learn about them. The tax bill currently pending before Congress contains several proposals that should make ESOPs more wide spread.

Let me summarize a few of the provisions—and what they are intended to do. At the outset, let me emphasize that these provisions pay for themselves. Actually, in all likelihood, these incentives will pay for themselves in increased tax revenue just based on increased productivity and sales.

But we didn't rely on that. The revenue estimates we work with generally don't account for any "feedback effect". So we paid for these provisions by freezing for one year a scheduled increase in the PAYSOP tax credit.

One provision we call the "ESOP rollover"—that provides for the tax-free rollover of the proceeds from the sale of a business to an ESOP or to a worker-owned cooperative, provided the proceeds are reinvested in the securities or another business within one year.

This provision is intended to provide for parity with the tax-free exchange provisions of current law. Under current law, the shareholders of a company have an incentive to merge their company with another, larger company in exchange for stock in that company because there is no tax on those shareholders until such time as they sell the stock they received in the exchange.

This provision will provide an incentive for such shareholders to instead sell their company to their employees through an ESOP because the proceeds from such a sale would not be taxed at the time of sale, provided the seller reinvests in other securities.

This provision should also be an aid to the continuity of small business because it would insure that there is an incentive to sell to the employees who helped to make the company succeed rather than selling to a larger company in exchange for their stock.

A second provision would allow a corporate deduction for dividends paid on ESOP stock, provided the dividends are paid out currently to employees or are applied to repay on ESOP loan.

This provision is designed to help bring home the reality of stock ownership to employees. The ESOP is a technique for enabling employees to share in any appreciation in their company's stock, appreciation that they helped to create. Yet in order for employees to realize just what it means for the company to succeed, this provision provides an incentive for the company to pay dividends, and to pay those dividends out to employees as income—which also has a potential for moderating increased wage costs.

A third provision would permit a bank, insurance company or other commercial lender to exclude from income 50 percent of the interest received on loans to ESOP companies, provided the loan proceeds are used to finance an ESOP's acquisition of company stock. This should provide an incentive for lenders to seek out companies to engage in ESOP financing.

A fourth provision provides that liability for estate taxes may be assumed by an ESOP in return for a transfer from the estate of stock of an equal value, provided the sponsor company guarantees payment of the taxes and agrees to pay such taxes over a 14-year period.

This provision is simply an adaptation of a current tax code provision giving family-owned businesses an opportunity to pay estate taxes on an installment basis. This provision adapts that concept to the "employee family".

As under current law, this provision would require payment of taxes over a 14-year period with interest. Interest payments only are required for the first four years, and interest is paid at only 4 percent on the first $1 million.

Another provision of the Senate bill permits an ESOP to be treated as a charitable organization for income, gift and estate tax purposes, provided donated stock is not allocated to the donor, family members of the donor or 25 percent shareholders.

George Pillsbury has written the Minnesota delegation and other Republicans in the Congress pledging a codicil to his will leaving 10 percent of his estate to Pillsbury employees. While in the Minnesota legislature 10 years ago, George Pillsbury sponsored and saw enacted an ESOP provision providing for charitable ESOPs as a matter of State tax law.

Other States have been active as well. Minnesota was the first. Three years ago, five States had ESOP legislation on their books. Today we have eleven States.

I first proposed legislation dealing with ESOPs in 1973 when the Congress was considering whether to extend financial assistance to the Penn Central and several other bankrupt railroads that later became Conrail. I am happy to note that those Conrail employees now own 15 percent of a profitable Conrail and if they have their way they are going to own a lot more of it.

When the Chrysler Corporation came to the Congress for financial aid, we required employee stock ownership in that company also. And those employees have done very well as a result.

Simple common sense tells you that a company is going to do better if its employees own a piece of the action. You know that and so do I. And the research supports that conclusion.

At Hyatt-Clark Industries in New Jersey, for example, General Motors decided to sell a subsidiary that supplied its roller bearing needs. The employees agreed to take a wage cut in order to make it feasible to buy that company. With 1200 employees, it is now one of the largest 100% employee-owned companies in the U.S.

What happened at Hyatt-Clark should serve as a lesson for all of us concerned about gain-sharing and workplace productivity. After the buyout, the workers at Hyatt-Clark showed unheard of productivity increases of 200 and 300 percent.

Why? Because the company was theirs. Anyone can understand that.

At Lowe's Company, a building supply chain headquartered in North Carolina, employees own more than 25 percent of the company through an ESOP. For reasons that no one can quite explain, their sales per employee are 3 times those of their competitors.

Lowe's shrinkage (losses due to theft, breakage, etc.) is one-sixth. Lowe's has already created more than 50 employee/owner millionaires. And Uncle Sam is collecting a lot more taxes as a result.

At E-Systems, a Dallas-based Defense contractor, their ESOP was accompanied by a sharp decline in turnover and absenteeism. And suddenly the suggestion box began to fill up. Other companies report similar results.

A study done for the Department of Commerce of companies with employee stock ownership found a strong correlation between employee ownership and profitability. Other things being equal, the more stock employees owned, the more profitable the company.

A 1980 study by the Journal of Corporation Law found that companies with ESOPs had twice the annual productivity growth as comparable, more traditionally-owned firms.

A 1983 study by the National Center for Employee Ownership found that companies with a majority of their stock owned by employees create three times more new jobs than firms in which employees owned no stock.

The 1984 book, "The 100 Best Companies in America to Work For," concludes that ownership sharing is one of the chief characteristics of the most desirable firms. They list eight substantially employee-owned companies among the top 100.

In their 1984 survey of the best companies for women to work for, Savvy magazine added nine new companies to their existing list. Five of the nine had substantial employee ownership.

In short, employee ownership warrants governmental encouragment—for a number of reasons.

It appears that companies with employee ownership also use resources more efficiently than others. Denver Yellow Cab, for example, is the largest worker coop in the United States—with over 1,000 employees. Their employee/owners now have the best safety record in the country.

There also appears to be link between employee ownership and a company's incentive to reinvest in plant and equipment. A study of plywood coops in the Pacific Northwest, for example, cited this advantage as a feature valuable to their remarkable long-term survival.

Delaware-based W. L. Gore Associates is another good case in point. With over 3,000 employees, they are 90 percent employee owned and have enjoyed a 40 percent annual rate of growth for several years.

Employee ownership can also make it easier for a company—and its employees—to respond to the business cycle. In an economic downturn, for example, belt tightening need not mean layoffs.

Instead it can mean an emphasis on job security. During lean economic times, rather than go without a pay raise, employees can take stock which later could be a lot more valuable. Should the company succeed, then that success is shared with those who helped to make that success possible.

The airline industry is a good case in point. Their deregulated environment has meant that airlines—and airline employees—have been forced to find ways to adapt to a more competitive market.

One of the strongest competitors has been People's Express which is one-third employee owned. Employees are required to buy stock in the company in order to work there. They want employees to think of the company as theirs. The average employee now owns $60,000 in stock.

Now the other airlines are using stock ownership to respond to that competition. For many of those companies, stock plans are providing a way to cut costs while ensuring that employees get something in return—that something being an ownership stake in their company's future.

The trucking industry is facing two problems. And they are using an ESOP to solve both. Their first problem was the newly deregulated environment. Responding to the low cost independents and the small nonunion firms meant finding a way to contain wage costs.

Their second problem was how to respond to the new truck tax Congress enacted in order to pay for road repair and improvements. With passage of the tax came permission to use larger trucks on the interstate highways. So their problem was twofold. How to get labor costs competitive and how to finance the acquisition of new trailers.

For several of the major fleets, their solution has been to turn to the leveraged ESOP. In return for more competitive wage rates from their drivers, management agreed to finance their new trucks by borrowing money for that purpose through an ESOP.

The most attractive feature of borrowing through an ESOP is that a company is allowed to take a deduction not only for interest payments on a loan but for principal payments as well. Thus, an ESOP company needs to generate only one-half as much revenue to repay a loan.

The Congress agreed to this tax advantage for ESOP companies in 1974 and I am happy to see that more and more companies are discovering just how helpful ESOP financing can be.

For example, in the case of three major trucking companies, the negotiated labor cost savings over a 5-year period were between $50 and $70 million. In return, the company ESOP borrowed a like amount and used those borrowed funds to buy newly-issued company stock. The company then used that new equity to upgrade its fleet of trucks.

Thus, rather than that money being paid out in employees' paychecks, the company instead used the money to repay the ESOP loan. Once the loan is repaid: The ESOP will hold almost 50 percent of the company's stock; the company will have upgraded its fleet; and the employees will have retained their jobs in difficult times while accumulating a sizeable personal capital estate in the ESOP. And by that time, the stock should be worth a great deal more than it cost the workers in pay raises that had to be postponed.

The Weirton Steel Company ESOP is another good example. Weirton Steel was a division of National Steel and National decided to phase out of the steel business. With the help of ESOP financing, the 7500 employees of Weirton were able to arrange for a 100% ESOP buyout of their company—now the 360th largest company in the U.S.

They appear to be off to a good start. In fact, Weirton just reported its first profitable quarter since 1981.

The examples I mentioned have all been distress situations. The vast majority of ESOP companies, however, are not distress situations. But the ability of employee stock ownership to work under such adverse circumstances indicates just how powerful a gain-sharing tool employee stock ownership can be.

Employee ownership provides a new, tax-advantageous, non-inflationary way both for a union to deliver to its members and for management to respond to union demands. This combination of advantages should provide a powerful new recruiting tool for those unions—and for those companies—with the foresight to embrace employee stock ownership.

It also provides a fruitful new area in which management and labor can resolve their differences. Stock ownership by employees—both management and rank-and-file employees—can create a work environment in which issues are resolved more constructively.

So when you are looking for ways to implement a gain-sharing program, don't forget the ESOP. Uncle Sam is happy to help you finance a portion of it. And the results can be extraordinary.

When I first began to advocate employee stock ownership, I was a bit of a lone voice in the wilderness. I am happy to report that's no longer the case. On the ESOP bill now pending as part of the deficit reduction tax package, there are 48 Senate sponsors—34 Democrats and 14 Republicans.

Representative Charles Rangel introduced the identical bill in the House—with a similar list of bipartisan cosponsors.

We welcome sponsors of all political persuasions. I am gratified to see such widespread support among both Democrats and Republicans. The support is growing day by day as more and more Members become aware of the many advantages of employee stock ownership. Having such broad support reminds me of a comment once made by that great American philosopher, Mae West who suggested that "Too much of anything is simply marvelous."

Organized labor in the U.S. has done a good job in securing for the working man things he might not have been able to get by himself. Employee stock ownership is the principal area in which the American labor movement has not done all that it could have for its members.

Just compare that for a moment to pensions. Organized labor has done a good job of getting the workers their share of private pensions. They haven't done nearly so good a job with regard to stock ownership.

If they had started a long time ago asking for stock, it would have built up by now to a sizeable amount. It is my hope that labor leaders will soon begin to negotiate for stock ownership. It does not have to be on the top of the shopping list. Just do not leave it off.

I am happy to report that Douglas Frazier, former President of U.A.W., had a taste of ESOPs while serving as a member of the board of directors at Chrysler. He recently joined the board of directors of Hyatt-Clark Industries, the New Jersey-based 100% employee-owned company I mentioned earlier.

Now that he's teaching I understand that one of the primary things his students are interested in is employee stock ownership. So let me suggest that employee stock ownership may just be the wave of the future for American labor.

Let me mention a few of the other reasons that I have advocated the idea of employee stock ownership.

A sense of ownership is crucial to the efficient and successful functioning of our private enterprise system. Motivation and productivity are an essential part of that picture—but only a part.

Let's look for a moment at the big picture—at how the U.S. economy is financed—and for whom it is financed. Having chaired the Senate Finance Committee for 14 years, I feel qualified to comment.

Consider for a moment that this year the U.S. economy will generate approximately $325 billion in capital expenditures. Between now and the end of the century—a scant 16 years away—we will create over $5 trillion in new capital.

Who is going to own all those assets? How much of that productive wealth is going to be owned by the workers who helped to create it?

Unless we do something to change the way in which economic growth is financed, almost all of that new capital will be owned by the same 5 to 10 percent of the population that already owns more than 90 percent of the nation's capital assets.

Does it matter? Should we care?

Well consider for a moment that for the majority of American families their most important form of "wealth" is now their entitlements under Social Security. Thus, for most American households, their most important asset is an assurance that their children will be taxed on their behalf.

Is that any way to run a private property economy? No, of course it isn't. And we should not allow it to continue.

If we are trying to build something that we can be proud of, we should build an economy where every working American has an opportunity to own a stake in that economy. Unfortunately, we are making relatively little progress in that regard.

I am sorry to report that except for the modest provisions dealing with employee stock ownership, tax policy in this country is making the rich richer—by ignoring the hopes and ambitions of those who are not rich.

That's not the correct direction for our free enterprise system. And I hope that we will take steps to change that. We ought to be doing better.

Consider for a moment the global picture. We are devoting immense amounts of our national resources to military expenditures to prevent socialism and communism from taking over Latin America, from taking over Asia, Europe, and Africa.

Yet all the armaments in the world will not save our system unless we are able to demonstrate to other nations just what it is that they could be doing instead of making that perilous decision to place ownership in the hands of the State.

It is difficult for me to believe that any thoughtful policy maker can think for a moment that socialism or communism is really in the best interests of his people. There are simply too many examples in the world of how badly such systems fall short of their expectations.

Nations turn to these forms of government out of sheer desperation. They simply cannot think of anything better.

Yet if they look to us for leadership, what do they see? They see a nation in which 50 percent of the privately-held capital is owned by only one-half of one percent of the population.

In fact, the ownership of productive assets in the United States—in relative terms—is about the same today as when Herbert Hoover succeeded Calvin Coolidge.

And here we are enriching that small group even more. Doing very little to broaden the base of ownership. Surely we can do better.

We desperately need a working model of what we would advocate for other nations. And I firmly believe that employee stock ownership is just such a model.

What could be a better answer to the unfulfilled promises of communism? Wouldn't employee ownership largely undermine the very rationale for Soviet-style ownership by the State?

Part of the problem is that we are not asking the right question when we fashion national economic policy. Right now, we tend to ask how many people have a job and how many are unemployed. That's clearly an important question—but it's an incomplete question.

We should also be asking how many people own something and how many don't? And how much do they own? Because if we haven't improved much on what it was fifty years ago, what is the matter with us? Why haven't we been doing something about that?

Rather than making the rich richer still, shouldn't we instead be working to see to it that working Americans have an opportunity to share in the future bounty of the United States?

We have the opportunity to offer this nation as a model for others. And this we must do if we are to live peaceably with our neighbors and if we are to win their hearts and their minds.

So the task, really, is fairly simple. What we must do is to save this world from something it definitely does not need by providing it with something that it does need. And employee stock ownership is a good place to start.

I urge you to get involved in this crucially important debate. A good way to get involved is to begin to transform the American workplace. I challenge you to make it more humane, more people-oriented, and more "us"-oriented.

In many ways, both the goal and the means to that goal are one and the same. Your challenge is to improve the quality of life in the workplace. That involves making sure that people are humanely treated. When they are involved in decision making, and when they are better rewarded for their efforts, productivity will increase. And as you boost productivity in your company, you help achieve a better quality of life for all Americans.

Just as a stream can rise no higher than its source, so too will your workplace be only as good as the ideas—and the ideals you bring to it. So make your company as good as you would have this country be. Dare to be a showcase. And others will follow your example.●

CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR SOVIET JEWS

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in support and participation of the 1984 Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil for Soviet Jews.

It is unfortuante that the need for this call to conscience is so necessary. The Soviet Union has repeatedly ignored the efforts of public officials and citizens of the United States to adhere to the three international documents to which the Soviet Union is a signatory allowing the right of Soviet Jews to emigrate from the U.S.S.R. Emigration has plunged to its lowest level since 1963 with only 1,314 being able to emigrate in 1983, a 98-percent decline since 1979.

In addition, a Government-sponsored anti-Zionist committee has been established in the Soviet Union recommending anti-Semitic books and endorsing anti-Semitic articles in state publications. Serious criminal charges as well as daily harassment against Soviet Jews have increased.

We are in the midst of witnessing yet two more victims of the Soviet Government's inhumane and cold-hearted policies in the tragic saga of Andrei Sakharov and his wife Yelena Bonner. We have been dismayed and frustrated during the past 8 years over one of the most famous refusniks, Anatoly Shcharansky, who is presently serving a 13-year prison term for daring to speak out for individual human rights and wanting to emigrate to be with his wife in Israel. In my first term as a U.S. Member of Congress, I have sponsored three families, the Boris Ghinis family, the Mikhail Kazanovich family and the Antanas Vausa family who, although are not all of Jewish descent, have still been denied the freedom to emigrate.

Mr. Speaker, the Call to Conscience Vigil is to call attention to what is happening today in the Soviet Union. It is my fervent hope and prayer that a year from now there will be no need for this special vigil, that the Soviet Union will finally live up to the international documents it signed, that all of its citizens, regardless of their religion, will be allowed to emigrate if they desire and be free to practice their religion and their culture.●

PERSECUTION OF THE HUNGARIAN MINORITIES IN ROMANIA

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, recently, I was contacted by a constituent of Hungarian descent concerned with the fate of relatives living in the Transylvanian section of Romania. Unfortunately, they are receiving unwarranted resistance from the Romanian Government. They wish to leave Transylvania, but to date, have been unsuccessful. In light of this, I wish to address my colleagues today on the difficulties encountered by persons of Hungarian descent who live in Transylvania.

For more than two decades, Romanian pressure against the Hungarians of Transylvania have been unrelenting including the suppression of the Hungarian school system, the prohibition of public usage of the Hungarian language and the mass resettlement of Romanians from the Romanian provinces into Transylvania. Furthermore, the Hungarians are discriminated against in the workplace, with no legal right for remedy.

The fate of these brave individuals deserves our deepest concern. We, who remain steadfast with ideals of liberty and freedom, must oppose these human and cultural rights violations. The 1947 peace treaty, requiring Romania to grant human rights to the Hungarians, has been broken repeatedly.

The Romanian Government has deprived the Hungarians the most important posession they have—their personal and political freedoms. As the Nation to which many others look for guidance on human rights, we must continually strive for the preservation and extension of basic human freedom for all people, regardless of the nation in which they reside.●

HON. RALPH REGULA

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time, and will not likely be the last, that I join my colleagues from the Steel Caucus to urge passage of the Fair Trade in Steel Act.

Last week the International Trade Commission [ITC] determined that imports had been a major cause of injury for a large portion of the domestic steel industry. This week the ITC is set to begin remedy hearings. The Commission then has until July 24 to make its final recommendation to the President who has until September 24 to act on their recommendation.

The ITC ruling was good news for the domestic steel industry and for American steelworkers. While the ITC ruling was an important affirmation of our claims that imports are seriously damaging the domestic steel industry, it is only the first step in the 201 process and in no way mitigates the need for quota legislation. More effective, comprehensive remedies are needed, such as we are advocating in H.R. 5081, the Fair Trade in Steel Act.

The ITC decision covers approximately 70 percent of this country's steel consumption. In 1982 we erroneously thought we had begun to resolve the steel import problem when the European Community and Japan agreed to reduce imports. Other countries, including the underdeveloped nations, merely picked up the slack and imports are currently capturing over one-quarter of the domestic market.

A comprehensive solution is essential if we are to avoid repetition of past pitfalls of piecemeal solutions.

The Fair Trade in Steel Act offers such a solution. The bill would impose quantitative restrictions on all imports of carbon and speciality steel products. Imports could not exceed 15 percent of the apparent domestic market based on historical patterns of trade from 1979 to 1981. More importantly, however, imposition of quotas would be tied to proof of a firm commitment on the part of the industry to modernize.

The steel industry desperately needs this time to recapture its competitive edge, to modernize its antiquated facilities. The bill would provide a temporary lull from the impact of unfairly traded steel imports and give the industry the window of opportunity necessary to stabilize employment and finance remaining modernization efforts.

The Fair Trade in Steel Act enjoys strong bipartisan support. It currently has 200 cosponsors in the House. I strongly urge prompt considerstion and passage or this critical legislation.●

BIPARTISAN COMMISSION FOR DEFICIT-REDUCTION

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, 2 days ago, several of our Nation's largest banks raised their prime lending rate to 13 percent. Banks throughout the Nation have followed suit.

What was the President's response to the rising of the prime to 13 percent? He acted as if he intended to find out who was responsible for this outrageous action and by golly he would give that individual what for.

Well Mr. President, I represent some people who can explain why the prime rate is going up.

I represent homebuilders who have already been through the economic wringer and know the consequences of high interest rates. They can tell you why the prime rate is going up. And the realtors, they'll be able to tell you in a minute what the problem is. Come to Tillamook, OR, where Crown Zellerback has just shut down their mill putting over 300 individuals out of a job, where the unemployment rate is over 18 percent, and those fine folks will be happy to tell you not only what the problem is, but what can be done to solve it.

Just talk to the people, Mr. President, and they'll tell you, because they know the cause.

Deficits, Mr. President. Massive Federal budget deficits which will double our entire Federal debt in the span of just 5 years. That's the cause.

How much more must we sacrifice to this fiscal policy which is plainly, and recklessly, out of control. Your administration is sending them up to Congress out of balance and Congress is passing them out of balance. Each day, the Federal Government will spend $547 million which it does not have. In order to do this it will borrow and borrow and borrow until 55 percent of all available credit has been absorbed. If present policies continue, this level of Government crowding out will reach 75 percent by 1989.

Recently, many of the Third World nations met to determine how they were going to repay the $800 billion in outstanding debt hanging over their heads—or should I say whether they were going to repay this debt. The International Monetary Fund is requiring austerity measures for these nations which is the political equivalent of squeezing blood from a turnip. And they are on the verge of revolt because the rate of interest they pay is linked to the U.S. rate of interest. If those nations refused to pay the debt, or a significant part of their debt, there would be a major loss of value in the stock of oppressed American banks. That could then turn into massive withdrawals of deposits and the banking system itself would be at risk.

And the prime rate just went up to 13 percent.

Clearly we cannot continue on this course. We must break the political impasse which has prevented us from making more than token gestures toward easing the deficit crunch and reassert control over the Federal budget.

Earlier this year the House went through the agonizing ritual of attempting to pass a budget resolution. Various alternatives were offered which differed in the degree to which each would have reduced the deficit. Members were faced with difficult votes and each of the alternatives, except for the Budget Committee amendment, went down to defeat.

Members of the Ways and Means Committee have just completed a long and tedious conference on the tax bill with their counterparts in the Senate. By all accounts it was a very difficult conference and the members of the committee—particularly the chairman. Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI—should be congratulated on their efforts.

However, in the final analysis, what did this package accomplish in terms of reducing our projected deficits?

If we legislate all of the recommendations into law, we will knock $182 billion of deficits which—by the Budget Committee's own estimate—will total $530.1 billion over the next 3 years.

We have gone through an agonizing political exercise and we have only scratched the surface. If this is the best Congress can do with a Herculean effort, then it's clear that an extraordinary step is needed now to solve the whole of the problem.

I believe the most useful tool for breaking the political paralysis would be a bipartisan commission structured along the lines of the National Commission on Social Security Reform.

Last year my colleague CHALMERS WYLIE and I introduced legislation, with bipartisan support, which would have established an independent commission charged with developing a comprehensive deficit-reduction package to be presented to the Congress for an up-or-down vote. I remain convinced that such a package, developed by a blue chip, bipartisan panel, could command the votes necessary to pass.

Over 150 of our colleagues joined in cosponsoring that measure along with a string of endorsements from former President Gerald Ford, Senate Majority Leader HOWARD BAKER, former CBO Director Alice Rivlin, and key leaders of the business community.

There is only one way to create a recovery for everyone to enjoy—slash the deficit. Those who think this problem can be dealt with trimming here and there at the edges are just dabbling around with the lives of workers everywhere—particularly in Oregon which has borne the brunt of our fiscal recklessness.

The prime rate has risen again and is now at 13 percent. It is no fluke and it is no statistical aberration. It is for real and it will strangle our economy unless we come to our senses and do something meaningful about the deficit.

That's why I'm redoubling my efforts to put in place a mechanism which will allow us to make substantial reductions in the budget defict. I am speaking of substantial institutional cuts—not one person's individual voting record. I personally have voted for less spending than the President asked for—than every president I've served under has asked for. I have voted against 14 of 25 differing one-man records; it needs a legislative majority that will enact a broad set of deficit reductions. The bipartisan commission is a tool we have at our disposal to do this. It has been proven effective in the past—we must apply it to the No. 1 domestic problem we now face.●

HON. ELWOOD HILLIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the recent decision of the International Trade Commission regarding the injury caused for foreign steel imports is most welcomed. It confirms what the Congressional Steel Caucus and the steel industry have long been saying: That our domestic steel industry is suffering as a direct result of foreign steel, and that traditional market mechanisms will not suffice.

It is clear that our domestic steel industry is in crisis. While the United States is in the midst of a recovery only half of the Nation's 400,000 steelworkers are employed. Even though the industry has radically trimmed its production facilities it is still utilizing only three-fourths of its capacity. Foreign steel imports continue their unabated growth, reaching a record high of 26 percent in the first quarter of this year.

Despite these statistics critics of efforts to stem this rising tide of foreign steel imports remain unconvinced of either the need for or desirability of quotas and tariffs or of H.R. 5081, the Fair Trade in Steel Act.

A column in yesterday's Washington Post concluded that the "steel industry is completing its kamikaze run" in asking for temporary protection. One of the problems creating the current situation was correctly identified as the industry's historical reluctance to modernize. In this column the industry's modernization efforts were described as "hooey." It has long been apparent that the steel industry did not respond to the changing international steel market as quickly as it should have. If it had it would not be in its current predicament.

It is unfair, however, to suggest that the industry continues to be unresponsive to international competition. Both white and blue collar workers at domestic steel facilities have been reduced drastically. A person touring Bethlehem Steel's Sparrows Point, MD, facility notices almost immediately how few people are working there. Those which remain are almost without exception middle-aged: There simply aren't young steelworkers anymore. The United Steelworkers, in cooperation with management, voted to reduce its wages and benefits. At the same time the industry is modernizing its facilities to bring them up to world class standards. To cite one example: Bethlehem Steel Corp. is currently investing $540 million to install continuous casters in its Burns Harbor, IN, and Sparrows Point, MD, plants. For the industry to modernize the office of technology assessment estimates that over $30 billion will be needed merely to replace obsolete equipment.

Where is the money to come from to finance this modernization? Private financial sources have largely been exhausted. Government financing is not possible. Only through increased sales will the industry be able to develop the money that will be needed to finance modernization.

The industry and its workers have demonstrated their commitment to full modernization. But they must be given the opportunity—the breathing space—in which to do so. Without quotas or tarrifs the steel industry will simply not be able to recapture a fair portion of the domestic market.

Opponents of this breathing space declare that by allowing this opportunity the United States will be violating the principle of free trade. I, too, am in favor of free trade. It is only through the exchange of products across national borders that producers and consumers are able to most efficiently produce, distribute, and acquire goods and services.

But free trade must also be fair trade. There are numerous documented instances of where foreign nations have dumped steel on American markets. Foreign markets are closed not only to American steel, but to a variety of American goods and services. Even with quotas or tariffs the American steel market will be the most open in the world.

I am perplexed about what further evidence those critics of the American steel industry need to prove to them that something must be done. The industry has lost $4.8 billion in the last 2 years. Thousands of steelworkers are unemployed. Countless facilities are closed, never to reopen. Steel imports are at an all-time high. The independent, bipartisan International Trade Commission, not known as a protectionist body, has ruled in favor of the steel industry. What more evidence is needed?

The ITC ruling is an important step in the recovery of the American steel industry. It should have gone further. To ignore its findings risks the survival of the entire American steel industry.●

ENVIRONMENTAL MONITORING IMPROVEMENT ACT

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, today with five of my colleagues, I am introducing the Environmental Monitoring Improvement Act of 1984. The act would establish a 3-year National Environmental Monitoring Commission to study and make recommendations to Congress for desperately needed improvements in our environmental monitoring programs.

Effective monitoring of the environment is essential for a rational and successful environmental protection program. Without effective monitoring, we cannot reliably detect any environmental contamination at an early stage when simple responses might head off major—and expensive—environmental cleanups. Without effective monitoring, we cannot reliably determine whether the billions of dollars we invest every year in pollution control are paying off in improved environmental quality. Without effective monitoring, we are forced to make difficult and potentially expensive policy decisions without the benefit of reliable data. As a result, costly regulation may occur where it is not needed while the real problems go undetected.

Over the last several years, the Subcommittee on Natural Resources, Agriculture Research and Environment of the Science and Technology Committee, which I chair, has held several hearings on the state of environmental monitoring programs. The testimony was overwhelming in its indictment of the present patchwork quilt of programs. Federal, State, regional, and local agencies each conduct their own individual, unrelated monitoring programs, according to their own institutional needs and perceptions. The result is a haphazard and uncoordinated system where the same data are collected by several agencies while other data are not collected by anyone. Witnesses from a wide variety of scientific, academic, and regulatory backgrounds decried the widespread failure to collect data in accordance with accepted scientific techniques. Widely varying standards and measuring techniques result in inconsistent and often low-quality data.

These major problems—fragmentation of programs, lack of quality assurance, incomplete data, and the lack of any directed and coordinated national data collection policy—are not new. In 1977, the National Academy of Sciences issued a report which concluded that "the Nation's information on environmental quality is deplorably and unnecessarily bad." These issues were the subject of congressional hearings back in 1977. They were the subject of a 1980 task force report at the Council on Environmental Quality. Despite the recognized need for addressing these problems, little has been done. Indeed, in late 1982, the Conservation Foundation was still able to say, without fear of contradiction, that "we have no monitoring data sufficient to describe accurately the extent or developing seriousness of any environmental problem."

The major obstacle to significant progress is institutional. With environmental responsibilities spread out across a host of Federal, State, regional, and local authorities, each with limited resources, it isn't surprising that each agency has focused on its own immediate needs without regard to the overall needs of a coordinated date collection program. As a result, there is a need to create a temporary commission which, while considering the needs of those agencies, will transcend the parochial interests of each agency and identify what is needed to create a truly national environmental monitoring program.

The bill I am introducing today, the Environmental Monitoring Improvement Act of 1984, would establish a 3-year Commission on Environmental Monitoring. The Commission would study the existing monitoring programs and attempt to forge a consensus on the type and quality of data that ought to be collected by the various Federal, State, regional, and local authorities. The Commission would be composed of 15 members, including the major Federal environmental regulatory agency heads and representatives of States, localities, academia, industry, and environmental groups, to be chosen by the President from a list of nominees submitted by the National Academy of Sciences.

At the end of its term, the Commission would report to Congress on its findings and make specific recommendations for any legislative changes that might be necessary to institute a coordinated and effective national environmental monitoring program.

The bill also requires the Environmental Protection Agency to submit to the Council on Environmental Quality an annual report which will contain environmental monitoring data and a section discussing the extent to which the Commission's recommendations have been instituted. This report, which will be used by CEQ in preparation of its annual report, will help the public and Congress determine whether progress is being made in this area.

The proposal for a National Commission to focus on this significant problem enjoys widespread support from State and local governments, academics, industry and environmental groups. This bill is an important step in putting our environmental monitoring programs on a rational and efficient basis.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation, the text of which follows:

H.R. 5958

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Environmental Monitoring Improvement Act of 1984".

FINDINGS; PURPOSES; DEFINITION

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) environmental monitoring includes the systematic measurement of ambient environmental quality and associated activities related to quality control, data management, analysis, and dissemination, and does not incude point source pollutant monitoring for compliance or enforcement purposes;

(2) environmental monitoring is a key to the identification of national and global environmental trends and future problems;

(3) during the last two decades it has become clear that further study and documentation of the deficiencies in the Nation's environmental monitoring programs and international monitoring programs in which the United States participates is needed, and that further research is needed regarding how to coordinate national ambient monitoring programs most cost-effectively;

(4) numerous environmental reports are unanimous in calling for improved national environmental monitoring and enhanced United States participation in international programs;

(5) deficiencies in environmental monitoring programs include failure to meet the full range of demands for high-quality data and analyses; failure to use scientific principles in design, operation, and analysis; poor coordination among existing monitoring programs; and institutional barriers to adequate monitoring;

(6) in recent years no significant progress has been made towards correcting the many problems in environmental monitoring;

(7) large amounts of our Nation's resources are being spent on monitoring the environment, and these resources are not being utilized cost-effectively; and

(8) improvements could be made in our Nation's environmental monitoring programs and international programs in which the United States participates which would result in more economical and efficient use of resources to gain more and better information to manage the environment.

(b) It is not the purpose of this Act to review, evaluate, or summarize monitoring conducted for enforcement purposes under any other Federal law.

(c) As used in this Act, the term "environmental monitoring" does not include any monitoring conducted for enforcement purposes under any other Federal law.

ENVIRONMENTAL MONITORING REPORT

SEC. 3. (a) On February 1, 1986, and annually thereafter, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall submit to the Chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality and to the Congress, a report (hereinafter called the "Environmental Monitoring Report") setting forth—

(1) an inventory and description of the scope of all existing national programs and international programs in which the United States participates, either directly or through support programs, for measuring natural resource trends, and the quality of the physical environment (including those components defined in section 201(1) of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969);

(2) an evaluation of each national and international ambient environmental monitoring program described in paragraph (1) of this subsection, including (but not limited to) information on effectiveness, quality of data, and comparability with other data;

(3) selected environmental quality data, or summaries thereof, pertaining to the quality of the physical environment (including those components defined in section 201(1) of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969); and any other environmental quality information needed by the President or by the Council on Environmental Quality for the preparation of the Environmental Quality Report required by section 201 of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969; and

(4) a report on the status of implementation of the recommendations made by the National Commission on Environmental Monitoring, established by section 4 of this Act.

(b) The first Environmental Monitoring Report shall be designed and prepared with the advice and assistance of the National Commission on Environmental Monitoring, established by section 4 of this Act.

(c) The heads of departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Federal Government shall provide such assistance as needed by the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to evaluate environmental monitoring programs and to prepare the Environmental Monitoring Report.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENVIRONMENTAL MONITORING

SEC. 4. (a) There is established a National Commission on Environmental Monitoring which shall—

(1) make a full and complete investigation and study of the Nation's environmental monitoring programs and those international monitoring programs in which the United States participates (directly or by providing support) and recommend to the Congress and the President a plan to improve environmental monitoring; and

(2) advise and assist in the preparation of the first Environmental Monitoring Report, in cooperation with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, as required by section 3 of this Act.

(b) Such Commission shall be composed of fifteen members, including the Chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality, the Administrators of the Environmental Protection Agency and of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the Director of the National Institute of Health, of the National Bureau of Standards, and of the United States Geological Survey; and nine members selected by the President from list of at least 15 nominees chosen by the National Academy of Sciences and representing State and local governments; regional and international commissions; industry; scientific and academic experts; and environmental, conservation and health groups. The Chairman of the Commission shall be elected by the Commission from among its members.

(c) The Commission shall, not later than three years after the date of enactment of this Act, submit a report as described by section 5 of the Congress and the President of the results of its investigation and study, together with recommendations for improvements in national environmental monitoring and United States participation in international and global monitoring programs. Upon submission of such report or upon expiration of such three-year period, whichever is sooner, the Commission shall cease to exist.

(d) The heads of the departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Federal Government shall cooperate with the Commission in carrying out the requirements of this Act, and shall furnish to the Commission such information as the Commission deems necessary to carry out this Act.

(e) The Congressional Budget Office, the General Accounting Office, the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress, the Office of Technology Assessment, the Congressional Clearinghouse on the Future, and other entities within the legislative branch shall make available to the Commission such information as may be required for the purpose of carrying out this Act.

(f) In the conduct of the study the Commission is authorized to contract, subject to the availability of appropriations therefor, with nongovernmental entities that are competent to perform research or investigations in areas within the Commission's mandate, and to hold public hearings, forums, and workshops to enable full public participation.

(g) The members of the Commission who are not officers or employees of the United States, while attending conferences or meetings of the Commission or while otherwise serving at the request of the Chairman shall be entitled to receive compensation at a rate not in excess of the maximum rate of pay for grade GS-18, as provided in the General Schedule under section 5332 of title V of the United States Code, including traveltime and, while away from their homes or regular places of business, they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 73b-2) for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

(h)(1) The Commission may appoint and fix the rate of pay of such staff as it considers necessary for the performance of its functions. Such staff may be appointed without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, except that no individual so appointed may receive pay in excess of the annual rate of basic pay payable for GS-18 of the General Schedule.

(2) The commission may procure temporary and intermittent services under section 3109(b) of title 5 of the United States Code, but at rates for individuals not to exceed the daily equivalent of the maximum annual rate of basic pay payable for GS-18 of the General Schedule.

(3) Upon request of the Commission, the head of any Federal agency is authorized to detail, on a reimbursable basis, any of the personnel of such agency to the Commission to assist the Commission in carrying out its duties under this Act.

MANAGEMENT CHANGES AT BATTELLE

HON. SID MORRISON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the director of Battelle's Pacific Northwest division for the past 5 years has been Dr. Doug Olesen. On June 18, he was selected to be Executive Vice President of the corporate entity, Battelle Memorial Institute, located in Columbus, OH.

Since being elected to Congress in 1980 I have learned about many of the exciting programs taking place in Hanford. Many of these activities are being performed at Battelle's Pacific Northwest Laboratory and much of the credit for the contributions that the research staff at that laboratory are making to a whole array of scientific disciplines is attributable to the leadership of Doug Olesen. Under his guidance he has positioned the talents of the Pacific Northwest Laboratories into research in basic energy sciences, food irradiation, waste management, and biotechnology.

I would like to congratulate Doug Olesen on being named executive vice president of Battelle and wish him every success in his new position. I would also like to congratulate Dr. William Wiley, who has been named the new director of Battelle Northwest. And, I look forward to seeing continuing successful research and development accomplishments at Battelle under Bill Wiley's leadership.●

STAR WARS AND ASATS

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, the development of new antisatellite weapons and ballistic missile defense systems threatens to start a dangerous new phase in the arms race. This expansion of the arms race presents an unnecessary danger to American security.

ASAT weapons pose a warrantless threat to satellites, which are a nation's "eyes" in space; ballistic missile defense systems such as the administration's "Star Wars" proposal are outlandishly expensive, and feed the dangerous illusion that we can somehow survive a nuclear war.

Both of these weapons reflect an alarming emphasis on nuclear warfighting, rather than on deterrence and arms control. Not only are they unnecessary; they are perilously destabilizing as well.

The administration's programs in this regard threaten to undermine ratified arms control agreements such as the ABM Treaty signed by President Nixon in 1972. The potentially disastrous effects of extending the arms race into space demonstrate the need to protect and strengthen existing arms control agreements, and to urgently pursue agreements to curb the further development of these dangerous, destabilizing weapons.

While the prospect of a new arms race in space is a critical issue for this country, it has been accompanied by much confusion. In an article in the June 23 Washington Post, Rick Atkinson delivers a clear and informative overview of the current situation regarding antisatellite weapons and ballistic missile defense. I commend this article to my colleagues, and request that it be printed in the RECORD.

"STAR WARS" AND THE ASAT PROJECTS: WARES AND WHYS OF SPACE DEFENSE

(By Rick Atkinson)

Since President Reagan threw down the gauntlet on March 23, 1983, and challenged the nation to rally behind an all-out research program seeking a space-based defense against nuclear missiles, Americans have been expected to learn a bewildering lexicon of acronyms and technical lingo: ASAT and BMD, MHV and HOE, boost phase and terminal phase, directed energy weapons and kinetic energy weapons.

Even the most socially responsible citizen can be excused for skipping to the comics or baseball standings in exasperation. To sift through the jargon of "Star Wars," potentially the most ambitious and expensive American military venture of this century, here is a primer on what the Pentagon has in mind:

First, consider ASAT (anti-satellite weapons). Contrary to common misperception, these are not part of Reagan's "Star Wars" plan, which is formally called the Strategic Defense Initiative, or SDI.

"Star Wars" is intended to kill incoming missiles. ASAT is intended to kill military satellites. "Star Wars" is a technology for "tomorrow," as one three-star general put it, while ASAT is a technology for "today."

Military strategists believe that in war, the United States and the Soviet Union would want to strike each other blind, deaf and mute by crippling the satellites vital to communications, reconnaissance and navigation. The Pentagon already depends on more than 40 satellites and plans to launch dozens more.

Unlike the United States, the Soviets have an ASAT ready for use today, although test results have been mixed, at best, since it was introduced in 1968. Perched atop a large SS9 rocket, the 4,400-pound satellite killer would make one or two orbits around Earth before destroying its target about three hours after launch by exploding like a grenade and showering the satellite with shrapnel.

The Soviet ASAT can reach about one-third of the U.S. satellites now in space, but cannot reach the more important American early warning and communication systems that are in orbits 12,000 miles and higher.

The United States first worked on crude ASAT weapons in the early 1960s, but the one being built today is much more sophisticated. Officially called the Miniature Homing Vehicle (MHV) but nicknamed "the flying tomato can," the 12-by-13-inch cylinder would be flown high into the atmosphere slung beneath an F15 fighter before being fired into space by a small rocket. The 33-pound cylinder then would use eight telescopes to home in on an enemy satellite and ram it.

Under development for six years, this U.S. ASAT was first tested Jan. 21, with a test of the homing device tentatively scheduled for next November, if Congress permits it. The Air Force also has begun work on a second-generation ASAT, which could involve ground-launched satellite killers or laser beams.

But some analysts, such as Cornell University physicist Kurt Gottfried, contend that ASATs are "very discouraging and extremely dangerous" since a blind, deaf and mute enemy is liable to lash out with unrestrained nuclear fury. Repeated Soviet calls for negotiations on an ASAT treaty were rebuffed by the White House because of a conviction that such a ban would be impossible to verify.

The House of Representatives, however, has voted to block U.S. testing of "the flying tomato can" for at least a year, provided the Soviets adhere to a self-imposed moratorium on deployment of their system.

Administration thinkers are pondering four negotiating strategies that would propose U.S.-Soviet restrictions on ASATs without prohibiting them. Some of the ASAT technology overlaps that of "Star Wars," which makes it difficult to limit the former without hamstringing research for the latter.

If ASAT is intricate, "Star wars" is bewilderingly complex.

Although the Strategic Defense Initiative was born officially when Reagan signed National Security Decision Directive No. 85 in March, 1983, Star Wars has been gestating for more than 15 years.

After bitter debate and at great expense, the United States in the early 1970s built a small anti-ballistic missile (ABM) system designed to destroy incoming warheads with interceptor missiles carrying nuclear warheads.

In 1972, the superpowers signed an ABM treaty that limited to one the ABM defensive systems each side could build. The fundamental premise was that anti-missile defense was potentially destabilizing because it might lead its possessor to believe that a first strike could be launched without the risk of retaliation.

In effect, Washington and Moscow agreed to leave their countries hostage to insure that neither would strike first. The United States even dismantled its ABM system because it was widely assumed that a good offense would always overwhelm a good defense.

Reagan has turned that logic upside down by suggesting that the United States may have the technical wherewithal to block the Soviet's best nuclear knockout punch, thus rendering impotent their offensive missiles.

"Star Wars" is carved into a four-stage program, as envisioned by Lt. Gen. James A. Abrahamson, the strategic defense director, in congressional testimony May 9. The research phase is expected to last until the early 1990s.

"Some future president and some future Congress will look at any of these systems and apply these three criteria: One, is it really technically feasible? Second, can we afford it? . . . And most importantly, does it reduce the level of risk in the world?" Abrahamson said in an interview last week.

If those future leaders agree to proceed, the research phase will be followed by an engineering phase, in which prototypes of the defensive systems would be designed, built and tested; a transition phase, in which the systems are built while the superpowers negotiate reductions in offensive missiles; and a final phase, in which the defense is completely built and offensive weapons "reach their negotiated nadir."

Even the most optimistic "Star Wars" supporters don't expect that final phase to occur until well into the 21st Century. Cost estimates for a full-blown "Star Wars" defense range from $100 billion to more than $1 trillion; the administration expects to spend $26 billion on research in the next five years alone.

Part of the reason "Star Wars" seems so muddy is that the current technical thinking is so inchoate. The challenge nearly defies imagination—trying to grapple with the simultaneous launch of thousands of missiles carrying tens of thousands of warheads collectively capable of reducing the United States to little more than a terrain of ashy craters.

Strategists also use a four-phase description when discussing a missile attack. A full "Star Wars" defense probably would be layered, or multitiered, so that warheads slipping through the first line of defense would be intercepted by the second line, ones slipping through the second would be intercepted by the third, and so forth.

The first phase in a missile attack, called the boost, is considered vital for defenders. The most threatening Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles are the 308 SS18s carrying a total of 3,000 accurate warheads.

In an attack, the first phase for the SS18s would last about five minutes during which the liquid-fueled rockets, each carrying roughly 10 warheads, climb through the atmosphere. The warheads, which are shaped like cones, are attached to a device known as a "bus" atop the rocket.

At the end of this five-minute phase, the bus separates from the rocket; the warheads then "hop off" the bus and begin heading toward their individual targets. They are escorted by a cloud of decoys, chaff and other "penetration aids" designed to fool a defender's radar.

But if a defender can destroy the rocket before the first five minutes are up, he need not worry about hunting and killing the individual warheads soaring through space. The rocket exhaust also provides an easily detected "signature" that is easier to track than the warheads.

Consequently, much of the current "Star Wars" research is focused on weapons that could find and cripple missiles during the boost phase. "Directed energy weapons" mounted on space-based battle stations would fire thin laser beams to burn holes in the rockets, either collapsing them or detonating their fuel tanks. Some researchers are trying to harness the X-rays generated by a nuclear explosion for conversion into missile-killing lasers.

There is a wide gulf between the true believers of "Star Wars" and the skeptics. For example, a group of Dartmouth College scientists believes that fewer than 100 laser-equipped battle stations would do the trick, while the Union of Concerned Scientists has estimated that the number may be closer to 2,400. Even a remarkable 95 percent efficiency against an all-out Soviet attack would allow enough warheads to "leak" through to cause catastrophic destruction.

Other skeptics argue that the Soviets could outwit "Star Wars" technology. Missiles could be coated to reflect laser beams, or warheads could be mounted atop "fast-burn" rockets that would cut the five-minute boost phase to 50 seconds (the American MX missile boost, by comparison, lasts about 2½ minutes).

Proponents retort, in turn, that the five tons of heavy reflective coating that would be required on each missile would cut the SS18's payload by 60 percent, while a fast-burn rocket also would be constrained severely in the number of warheads it could carry.

"The assumption and the assertion . . . that there's a simple and easy countermeasure for anything we might do I just flat reject," Abrahamson said.

The United States also is looking at other defensive weapons to shoot down warheads either during or after the boost phase. "Kinetic energy weapons" include interceptor missiles and "hyper-velocity" guns capable of shooting a projectile at a speed of five or six miles per second. The Army last week successfully destroyed a dummy warhead more than 100 miles above the Earth with something called a Homing Overlay Experiment (HOE) vehicle launched atop a rocket. The HOE, essentially a 15-foot metal net, wrecks the warhead on impact.

There is a problem facing defenders trying to intercept warheads closing in on U.S. targets in the "terminal phase": Soviet warheads probably are "salvage fused," meaning they are rigged to detonate if struck by defensive weapons. A two-megaton bomb (equivalent to 2 million tons of TNT) exploding at 50,000 feet above Earth would severely damage civilian structures, a result something akin to the Vietnam paradox of "destroying the village in order to save it."

As the scientific and military arguments rage—for example, how would the United States defend against Soviet bombers and low-flying cruise missiles?—there also are bitter disputes about the diplomatic consequences of "Star Wars." Several treaties appear to stand in the way of testing or deploying the missile defenses, such as the Outer Space Treaty of 1967, which forbids "any objects carrying nuclear weapons" into orbit and would seem to preclude X-ray lasers.

Fundamentally, the argument seems to come down to disparate opinions about the effective and proper use of technology.

Physicist Herbert Lin, writing in the April issue of "Technology Review," warns, "Contending nations would seek out weapons not neutralized by ballistic missile defenses (BMD), such as nuclear cruise missiles, nuclear warheads carried by torpedo, nuclear weapons exploded at sea to create huge tidal waves and inundate coastal cities, and nuclear 'suitcase bombs' assembled in enemy cities from smuggled parts."

But Abrahamson, the "Star Wars" czar, countered with a cheerier vision when interviewed last week: "I believe what the Russians respect most about the U.S. is what we can do technically. We can do in this country just about anything we set out to do technically . . . if we decide we want to do it."●

A SUMMARY OF DISASTER PROGRAMS AVAILABLE TO DESIGNATED AREAS

HON. THOMAS A. DASCHLE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, the recent devastating floods in the Midwest have caused widespread damage, so extensive that many areas have already been proclaimed as disaster areas by the President, and many more are on the verge of being so declared. My own State of South Dakota has requested that 21 counties receive such a designation. The latest reports indicate that, as a direct result of the June floods, over 7 million acres in the area have been affected, and agricultural losses alone are estimated preliminarily at $1.3 billion.

The scope of this disaster verges on the overwhelming. Equally overwhelming, however, is the confusion as to what programs of Federal assistance are available, how they are to be applied for, and what procedures are to be followed in expediting delivery of whatever assistance is in fact available. In an attempt to clarify this situation for my constituents, and for many of my colleagues who find themselves in situations similar to mine, I have prepared a brief summary of programs available for dealing with this disaster, both after a Presidential declaration is made, and in the absence of such a declaration. Much of the information listed here is taken from various publications of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Small Business Administration, and the Department of Agriculture.

The summary follows:

SUMMARY OF DISASTER PROGRAMS AVAILABLE TO DESIGNATED AREAS

A. ASSISTANCE WITHOUT A PRESIDENTIAL DECLARATION

In some instances, disaster assistance may be available from the federal government and voluntary agencies without a presidential declaration of disaster or emergency. Of most relevance to the current situation are the following:

1. Search and Rescue.—The U.S. Armed Forces may assist in search and rescue operations, evacuate disaster victims, and transport supplies and equipment.

2. Flood Protection.—The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has the authority to assist in floodfighting and rescue operations and to protect, repair, and restore federally constructed flood-control works threatened, damaged, or destroyed by a flood.

3. Health and Welfare.—The Department of Health and Human Services may provide assistance to State and local welfare agencies and to State vocational rehabilitation agencies. The Public Health Service can aid States and local communities in emergency health and sanitation measures. The Food and Drug Administration may work with State and local governments in establishing public health controls through the decontamination or condemnation of contaminated food and drugs.

4. Emergency Conservation Program.—The State Director may designate areas eligible for the Emergency Conservation Program of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) of the Department of Agriculture. The program provides for cost-sharing grants of up to 80% to rehabilitate farm lands damaged by natural disasters.

5. Emergency Loans for Agriculture.—In areas designated as eligible by the State Director under delegated authority, the Farmers Home Administration may make emergency loans to farmers and ranchers. Application for these loans may be made at the FmHA County Office. All farmers and ranchers in the designated area who have suffered a loss of property or production due to natural disaster are eligible. Loan ceiling is established at $500,000 for actual new disaster loss, and loans may not exceed 80 percent of actual losses. Repayment period is defined as "quickly as possible", with operating expenses repaid up to 7 years, rescheduled within a period not to exceed an additional 7 years. It is possible under certain conditions to extend as long as 20 years. Loans for real estate purposes may be made scheduled for up to forty years. For actual loss loans to applicants able to obtain credit elsewhere, the interest rate is 13.75 percent. For actual loss to applicants unable to obtain credit elsewhere, interest is 5 percent on the first $100,000 borrowed, and 8 percent on additional amounts up to the $500,000 limit.

6. Disaster Loans for Homeowners and Businesses.—The Small Business Administration can provide both direct and bank-participation disaster loans to qualified homeowners and businesses to repair or replace damaged or destroyed private property when the SBA Administrator declares a disaster loan area under SBA statutory authority. Economic injury loans can help small firms suffering economic losses as a result of disaster. For homeowners and businesses suffering actual physical damage, maximum loan rate is 100 percent of uninsured loss up to $500,000 at an 8 percent rate of interest, if credit is available elsewhere. If credit is not available elsewhere, interest rate is 4 percent.

7. Repairs to Federal Aid System Roads.—The Federal Highway Administration can provide assistance to restore roads and bridges on the Federal Aid System.

B. ASSISTANCE WITH A PRESIDENTIAL DECLARATION

All programs available listed above are also available under a presidential declaration. However, there are several additional avenues of assistance under such a presidential declaration. In the first place, such a declaration automatically brings into action the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). As soon as possible after the President's action, the FEMA Associate Director of State and Local Programs of Support, based on the Governor's request, designates the counties or other political subdivisions that are eligible for federal assistance. The Associate Director also appoints either the appropriate FEMA Regional Director or another federal official as the Federal Coordinating Officer (FCO).

The FCO establishes a temporary Disaster Field Office within the affected area to coordinate the disaster relief and recovery effort. This office is staffed with representatives of federal agencies having disaster assistance responsibilities and is usually located in conjunction with the Office of the State Coordinating Officer, who is appointed as a liaison by the Governor. All coordination of all federal assistance is then conducted through application to the FEMA office.

This assistance, over and above the program listed above, includes the following:

1. Assistance to Individuals.—a. Temporary housing until alternate housing is available for disaster victims whose homes are uninhabitable. Minimum essential repairs to owner-occupied residences in lieu of other forms of temporary housing, so that families can return quickly to their homes.

b. Temporary assistance with mortgage or rental payments for persons faced with loss of their residences because of disaster-created financial hardship.

c. Disaster unemployment assistance and job placement assistance for those unemployed as a result of a major disaster.

d. Individual and family grants of up to $5,000 to meet disaster-related necessary expenses or serious needs when those affected are unable to meet such expenses through other programs or other means.

e. Legal services to low-income families and individuals.

f. Distribution of food coupons to eligible disaster victims.

g. Social Security assistance for recipients or survivors, such as death or disability benefits or monthly payments.

h. Veterans' assistance, such as death benefits, pensions, insurance settlements, and adjustments to home mortgages held by the VA, if a VA home is damaged.

i. Waiver of penalty or early withdrawal of funds from certain time deposits.

2. Special Assistance to Agriculture.—In addition to the loan programs mentioned above, the Secretary of Agriculture has, at his discretion, the authority to make disaster cash payments to farmers for crops either lost through flooding, or crops prevented from being planted through flooding. Prices and percentages vary according to crop, but for many it is 50 percent of target price on up to 60 percent of normal yield. In addition, payment of up to 80 percent of the cost to eligible farmers who perform emergency conservation actions on farmland damaged by the disaster, and provision of federally owned feed grain for livestock and herd preservation. All these programs would be coordinated through the FEMA office.

3. Assistance to State and Local Governments.—As soon as practicable following the President's declaration of an emergency or a major disaster, FEMA personnel conduct briefings for State and local officials to inform them of the types of assistance available under the declaration and the means by which funds are provided for eligible disaster assistance projects.

Following these briefings, Federal engineers prepare Damage Survey Reports to provide FEMA with a recommended scope of work and estimated costs in accordance with FEMA eligibility criteria. A Project Application, accompanied by supporting Damage Survey Reports, is submitted by an eligible applicant through the State to the FEMA Regional Director for approval.

Eligible applicants are States, political subdivisions of States, Indian tribes or authorized tribal organizations, Alaska Native Villages or organizations, and qualifying private nonprofit institutions within the designated disaster area. Rural communities or unincorporated towns or villages within the designated area may also receive assistance when their requests are submitted by an eligible applicant.

The Project Application must be submitted to the Regional Director within 90 days of the date of the President's declaration of a major disaster or within 30 days of the declaration of an emergency, unless the Regional Director specifically shortens or extends that period due to unusual circumstances.

Under a major disaster declaration, Project Applications may be approved to fund a variety of projects, including:

Clearance of debris, when in the public interest, on public or private lands or waters;

Emergency protective measures for the preservation of life and property;

Repair or replacement of roads, streets and bridges;

Repair or replacement of water control facilities (dikes, levees, irrigation works, and drainage facilities);

Repair or replacement of public buildings and related equipment;

Repair or replacement of public utilities;

Repair or restoration of public facilities damaged while under construction;

Repair or restoration of recreational facilities and parks, and Repair or replacement of private nonprofit educational, utility, emergency, medical, and custodial care facilities, including those for the aged or disabled, and facilities on Indian reservations.

In submitting a Project Application, an eligible applicant may receive a small project grant when the total cost of all the work is less than $25,000. On a small project grant the applicant can repair damage or build a new unrelated facility receiving 75 percent of the eligible grant. When a 75/25 FEMA/nonFederal division of costs is established by the FEMA-State Agreement, a small project grant must be less than $18,750. For Project Applications approved over this amount the applicant may elect one of several funding options. These include categorical grants and flexible funding grants.

Categorical grant.—Damaged facility must be restored to predisaster condition; the applicant receives 75 percent of the eligible costs when a 75/25 FEMA/nonFederal division of costs is established.

Flexible funding.—Applicant has the option to restore selected facilities or construct new non-disaster related facilities and receive 90 percent of the otherwise eligible grant. This grant is available for permanent restorative work only. When a 75/25 FEMA/nonFederal division of cost is established, the grant is 90 percent of 75 percent or 67.5 percent.

Other forms of assistance which may be made available under a Presidential declaration of a major disaster include:

Community disaster loans from FEMA to communities that may suffer a substantial loss of tax and other revenues and can demonstrate a need for financial assistance in order to perform their governmental functions;

Certain forms of hazard mitigation assistance from FEMA;

Repairs and operating assistance to public elementary and secondary schools by the Department of Education.

While all of the programs listed above could be activated during a disaster, it is likely that only one would be employed for the limited nature of an emergency declaration and would involve problems which are beyond State and local capabilities.●

THE FARRAKHAN CANCER

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, it is terribly important that public figures not let the latest remarks of Louis Farrakhan pass without condemnation. Among the first to speak out should be every Member of Congress of the United States.

I would not want to face my constituents or my children unless I expressed my revulsion and contempt at Louis Farrakhan's remarks describing Judaism as a "gutter religion" and supporters of Israel as "part of a criminal conspiracy." The cancer of anti-Semitism must be attacked wherever it appears and Louis Farrakhan's words must not go unchallenged.

I represent people of all faiths and all races in Bucks County and eastern Montgomery County, PA. If America means anything—it means that all of us should be tolerant of each other and intolerant of those who seek to divide us on the basis of color or creed.

I hope that the Reverend Jesse Jackson will join us in repudiating Louis Farrakhan once and for all, to put to rest this sickness symbolized by Farrakhan's hideous and monstrous words.●

SAGINAW CHIPPEWA INDIAN RIGHTS

HON. DONALD JOSEPH ALBOSTA

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of representing many members of the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe of Michigan. Tribal Chairman Arnold Sowmick has contacted me and asked me to bring a matter of great importance to the House's attention.

As you know, our Nation's history is spotted with examples of Indian abuse. Many times in our past we have taken treaty reserved lands without adequately compensating tribes. In the last 20 years we have tried to right our past wrongs and provide some, although usually minimal, compensation for the land we forcefully acquired.

BACKGROUND

Today, I would like to bring to your attention the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe of Michigan was awarded $12,419,361 under four separate Indian judgment fund dockets. In January 1983 the funds under docket 57, approximately $16.7 million, were distributed to individuals. The majority of the award, approximately $16 million, was paid out in per capita payments. The remaining funds were retained for tribal purposes. Within the next year the remaining three dockets totaling approximately $7 million will be distributed. The Bureau of Indian Affairs [BIA] has recommended that these dockets be distributed under the same plan as the first docket was distributed.

PROPOSALS

The tribe feels that the BIA recommendation fails to take into account the vital needs of the tribe and hinders future economic growth of the tribe. Therefore, the tribe has opted to seek special judgment fund distribution legislation funneling 100 percent of the final three awards into tribal programs and investment. Under this legislation, the tribe would set up a principal investment fund. The majority of the interest generated from this fund would be used for economic development purposes; the other 10 percent would be reinvested into the principal investment fund. The tribe feels the principal investment fund will help them achieve their goal of economic independence from the Federal Government.

As well as representing tribal members of the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe, I also represent many descendants of the tribe who are concerned that they will not receive any benefits from the award. Descendants of the tribe believe they are entitled to a portion of the benefits. If the BIA plan used previously was again utilized for distribution of the remaining dockets' funds, each descendant would receive approximately $1,600.

I am introducing this fund distribution legislation at Chairman Sowmick's request to give both the descendants and the tribe the opportunity to present their cases at hearings on the measure. I hope that through extensive hearings on the distribution plan the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs can work out a plan that is acceptable to both the tribe and the descendants.●

RELEASE THE POOR ELDERLY FROM THE BONDS OF EXCESSIVE PAPERWORK

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, Today I introduce H.R. 5955 which represents the first step in reducing the tremendous paperwork burden which the Nation's elderly face in order to recieve Government benefits and services.

This paperwork burden is a serious problem. A recent survey by my staff revealed that there are at least 12 forms for different Social Security benefits. Some of these forms are:

Application for Mother's or Father's Insurance Benefits;

Application for Retirement Insurance Benefits;

Application for Wife's or Husband's Insurance Benefits;

Application for Parent's Insurance Benefits;

Application for Lump Sum Death Payment;

Application for Widows or Widowers Insurance Benefits;

Application for Disability Insurance Benefits;

Application for Supplemental Security Income;

Application for Medical Insurance;

Application for Hospital Insurance;

Application for Health Insurance Under Medicare for Individual with Chronic Renal Disease;

Patient's Request for Medicare Payment.

The Veterans' Administration requires separate application forms for burial benefits, burial flags, headstones and burial markers, and death pensions. It seems reasonable that a survivor would need and apply for all of these benefits at about the same time. Why then, should he or she be asked to complete four different forms which request similar information? This is a tremendous waste of the taxpayers' time and money.

The legislation which I introduce today orders the Department of Health and Human Services to study duplicative information collection and recommend ways to reduce it. This approach has worked successfully in the past. The Internal Revenue Service developed the new 1040 EZ form after researching the needs of low and middle income taxpayers. This new form contains only 11 lines.

In order to develop this new form, the IRS contracted with a private firm to interview typical taxpayers in the under $50,000 income group. The firm recommended numerous graphic and design changes to simplify existing forms. Then, at a meeting in early 1982, the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service pressed the staff to develop a new, short, simple form that the majority of low and middle income taxpayers could use. An IRS official said recently that it was this pressure from the chief executive of the agency that led to the quick development of form 1040 EZ.

The form was used for the 1982 tax season. Over 15 million people used the form in 1982, and it was the top choice for single taxpayers with income under $50,000, whose only income was from wages, salaries, and tips.

If we in the Congress provide the leadership on this issue, we can institute the same kind of swift action throughout the Federal Government.

The study is to be financed with up to $100,000 of the existing revenues of the Department. No additional funds would be appropriated.

As an original member of the Aging Committee, I have long been concerned about the confusing, duplicative forms which the elderly must complete. I believe that this study will be the first step in a major governmentwide campaign to free the elderly from tremendous and unnecessary paperwork requirements.

The text of the legislation follows. I hope that all of my colleagues will join me in supporting this important legislation.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall conduct a study on the collection by the Department of Health and Human Services of information from individuals, such as information collected through written report forms and application forms, to determine what information is being collected from the same class of individuals more than once. The Secretary shall study in particular the information required in forms that elderly persons must complete in order to receive Federal benefits under the jurisdiction of such department.

(b) The Secretary shall complete the study not later than the end of the first fiscal year beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act and shall report to Congress not later than 90 days after completion of the study. The report shall include detailed recommendations for collecting information more efficiently and reducing information collection that is duplicative. The Secretary may use not more than $100,000 of funds appropriated after the date of the enactment of this Act to conduct the study.●

NATIONAL WILDERNESS AREAS

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, national wilderness areas benefit our society by protecting pristine wildlife habitat and watershed, and providing recreational opportunities for the hearty. Unfortunately, most wilderness proposals in Congress ignore the multiple-use ethic of public lands management and threaten the practice of true conservation. Specifically, nearly every wilderness bill passed by the House fails to address the need for orderly, professional, and prudent development of natural resources. Time after time, economic needs take a back seat to preservationist demands.

While ecological preserves, untrammeled by man, are certainly a legitimate multiple-use of public lands, it makes no sense to completely restrict logging, mineral development, grazing, recreation, watershed mangement, and other competing choices from excessive amounts of productive acreage. Often, these operations are fully compatible with esthetic values. Always, leaving our options open is best for posterity.

It is my hope that the House will someday bite the political bullet and work harder to represent the consensus view on the wilderness debate. As stewards of our national heritage, we have a duty to reconcile what land uses are in the public interest in a more scholarly manner. For starters, wilderness benefits ought to be commensurate with the opportunity costs of nondevelopment. At this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I would like to submit an excellent discussion of the wilderness issue and the myths that surround it. The following article, written by L. Cortland Lee and Paul K. Driessen, lends some commonsense to this emotional debate.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, June 21, 1984]

KEEPING ALL U.S. NATURAL RESOURCE OPTIONS OPEN

(By L. Courtland Lee and Paul K. Driessen)

When it comes to the environment, America's decisions often seem driven by myths and emotions. Essential facts and vital components of the "public interest" are often forgotten. The continuing debate over wilderness is a good example.

Many argue for expanding the nation's wilderness system and placing no limitation on either the total acreage or the number of times an area can be studied for wilderness. The ongoing process developed to serve these ends graphically illustrates the power of fear and mythology. Several myths particularly merit attention.

Myth No. 1. The choice is between wilderness preservation and development. Wilderness is the only way to protect natural values, and failure to designate an area as wilderness leaves it open to destructive development, forever foreclosing the wilderness option.

Perhaps prior to the environmental era there was some merit to the claim that wilderness designation alone could safeguard natural values. Passage of numerous state and national air, water, land use and wildlife laws since 1969, however, voids this argument.

A host of land use classifications today strictly regulates development. Human activities may be restricted to certain seasons of the year; especially sensitive areas can be closed all together; and even the most carefully designed proposal must first be reviewed by the public and various agencies.

The very fact that numerous areas are suitable today for wilderness underscores how well these laws work. It is ironic that the biggest push for wilderness has come when it is least needed. The national wilderness system now stands at 228 million acres—an area bigger than California, Nevada, and Utah combined.

Myth No. 2. Once affected in any way by development, an area is forever unsuitable for wilderness. Development of even a few acres in a 40,000-acre wilderness study area (WSA) renders the entire area unsuitable.

The Cumberland Island Wilderness area is blanketed with roads and inhabited homes. In one case, a paved road was included in a wilderness area; the Forest Service simply tore it up, reseeded the area, and let nature take over. Throughout the West, numerous areas with old mines, clear cuts, roads, homesteads, and wheat fields have been designated as wilderness, on the ground that nature had reclaimed the land or would soon do so.

Regardless of what some might say, signs of man obviously do not destroy wilderness suitability. The area merely has to look natural, now or in the near future, and modern reclamation methods can work wonders. Moreover, areas released from wilderness study will be managed under our general land and environmental laws for hiking, scientific study, and a wide range of uses prohibited in wilderness.

Myth No. 3. We can always terminate an area's wilderness status and open it to development "if truly compelling reasons" arise.

Behind this argument is the "kitchen faucet theory of resource development"—that we can find and develop energy and resources instantaneously, whenever the need arises. Unfortunately, it just isn't so.

Contrary to some claims, as studies by the U.S. Geological Survey and others show, many wilderness areas and WSAs may have significant energy and mineral deposits. It takes years to find and produce them (13 years from leasing to production at Prudhoe Bay, our biggest oil field).

The wilderness designation process has become a one-way street. Areas get reviewed for wilderness every 10 years until they get designated. However, once in wilderness, it will almost literally take a major war or other calamity to get them out—and the environmental destruction that will accompany the mad rush to explore and develop under those circumstances can easily be imagined.

Bertrand Russell once wrote, "Neither a man nor a crowd nor a nation can be trusted to act humanely or think sanely under the influence of a great fear." Wilderness advocates have fostered a gnawing fear in many of us: a fear that we have only a few natural areas left; that a "wilderness experience" can be enjoyed only in designated wilderness areas; and that every remaining area will be developed or paved over if it is not designated wilderness at once.

It is time we examined these myths carefully, before we make decisions that are neither necessary nor in our long-term best interest. We cannot afford to close off the vast majority of our natural resource options, out of a mistaken belief that only by doing so can we preserve wilderness values and options.

L. Courtland Lee and Paul K. Driessen have been involved in the wilderness study and designation process since 1977.●

FOSTERING WORLDWIDE DEMOCRACY

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to read the following article about fostering democracy around the world by providing training and financial aid to countries working to save or beginning to develop a democratic system I read in the June 27, 1984 edition of the Washington Times. This article makes a good argument for the funding of the National Endowment for Democracy [NED].

The article follows:

[From the Washington Times, June 27, 1984]

TOUTING DEMOCRACY IS WORTH THE COST

(By Morton Kondracke)

In late July and early August 1975, President Ford visited Eastern Europe, but the crisis on his mind was in Portugal, where a fledgling revolutionary government was in danger of going communist.

As the American president's entourage made its way from Poland to Finland to Yugoslavia, the word from Secretary of State Henry Kissinger to reporters on the trip was that democracy's cause has been lost, that Portugal was "going down the tubes."

When Ford, Kissinger, and Co. headed back home, I went to Portugal and found that what they'd said just wasn't so. True, the military junta that has taken over from right-wing civilians in 1974 was split. There was danger that the country would be taken over by far-left officers and Communist Party boss Alvaro Cunhal, who were receiving massive funding from the Soviet Union.

But Portugal's democrats were fighting back and the U.S. ambassador to Lisbon at the time, Frank Carlucci, knew better than his bosses in Washington that they could win.

And they did win, thanks to a $10 million infusion to Portugal's Socialist party from the Friedrich Ebert Foundation, the international political arm of the West German Social Democratic Party.

West Germany has three political foundations—funded by the government—which foster democracy around the world, training trade unionists, journalists, businessmen, judges, and politicians, and occasionally providing discrete funding to democrats in trouble, as in Portugal and also in Spain, where the Socialist Party (now in power) was sustained for years by the Ebert Foundation.

America ought to have a counterpart to the German foundations. In fact, we do have one—the brand new National Endowment for Democracy—but it is in danger of being killed in its infancy by Congress.

In a money-saving frenzy, a coalition of conservatives and liberals voted on May 31 to cut off NED's $31 million funding for next year. The Senate is supposed to take up the issue soon.

President Reagan favors the endowment. In fact, he gave it birth in one of the best speeches of his presidency—the one he delivered to the British Parliament in June 1982, calling for a long-term "global campaign for democracy . . . which will leave Marxism-Leninism on the ash heap of history as it has left other tyrannies which stifle freedom." It's time for the President to get to work to save his creation from destruction.

The endowment made one embarrassing mistake in its early months. One of its four subordinate organizations, the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development, was found to have given money to a candidate in the spring elections in Panama. The endowment board has since banned interference in elections.

Mistakes do get made in fledgling organizations, especially when they are entering into an experiment. But the experiment is certainly worth embarking upon.

The basic conception behind the NED is for private American organizations—the Democratic and Republican parties, the AFL-CIO and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce—to use federally supplied funds to assist democratic forces in the world openly.

According to NED executive director Carl Gershman, these are some of the projects the Endowment has initiated or is considering.

Institution-building in the Third World.

The AFL-CIO has the most practice in this field and is scheduled to receive the bulk of NED money to expand its training of peasant union organizers and democratic politicians. Mr. Gershman said the union, the parties, and the Chamber of Commerce also could work with Third-World newspaper editors, religious groups, and businessmen to press for democratic change in their countries.

Aid to dissidents in communist countries.

The AFL-CIO, on its own, assisted the Polish trade union Solidarity. Other NED ideas included publication of dissident books in the West (in hopes they would filter back behind the Iron Curtain) and provision of medical and financial assistance to dissidents and their families.

A Congress of Cultural Freedom composed of democratic movements in various countries that would collaborate in challenging totalitarian movements in the worldwide "war of ideas."

The Soviet Union spends vastly more money than Western countries to send representatives to peace, youth, and cultural conferences around the world. A NED-backed Congress could strive to correct the balance. The Congress also would arrange meetings of democrats to discuss how to foster freedom in various countries.

A publication in Chinese directed at the thousands of students from the People's Republic of China who are attending colleges in the United States and Europe.

The publication would be a forum for discussing the future of China and for inculcating democratic values.

A project to train and exchange lawyers and law students in human-rights watchdog groups in Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

Projects such as these could be financed by the CIA—and often have been in the past. NED is a far better way to foster democracy—an open and aboveboard way, in keeping with American values.●

FREE TRADE, FAIR TRADE, OR NO TRADE

HON. GENE TAYLOR

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, Gerald L. Lynch, consultant to the chairman of the board of Colt Industries and a member of the Presidential Advisory Committee for Trade Negotiations, recently spoke to the Economic Round Table of Los Angeles on the subject of trade.

I know of no subject of greater importance to our Nation today. I recommend Mr. Lynch's remarks as important reading to my colleagues:

FREE TRADE, FAIR TRADE, OR NO TRADE

When I was in Detroit last month I read with great interest an article in the Detroit News under the caption: "Need for Import Quotas Said to be Inevitable".

The writer discussed what would happen to the domestic automobile industry if the U.S. did not renew with the Japanese next March its "voluntary restraint agreement" which provides for quotas on the importation of Japanese cars. The article opened on the following ominous note:

"On March 31, 1985, a great invasion fleet appears off the California Coast.

"It consists of a host of transports, loaded to the gunwales with small Japanese cars.

"Import restrictions are about to expire; the Japanese companies are responding with a sudden flood of car shipments and soon will capture as much as 45 percent of the U.S. car market.

"This is a familiar Detroit nightmare. Domestic auto makers hope it remains just that."

World trade is complex. It is interrelated with many economic, financial and political considerations which are not apparent until a specific trade relationship is examined.

International trade is conducted on an entirely different basis than trade between our 50 States. Each of the nations is a sovereign state and has the authority and power to prescribe its own rules of trade with the other nations of the world. This is in marked contrast to the rules of trade between our 50 States.

Our Founding Fathers insisted, as a condition of membership in our indissoluble union, that each state surrender forever to the Federal Government the right to regulate interstate commerce and the power to enforce it. Over a century ago we fought a bloody Civil War to uphold the indissolubility of this union and the Constitution which held it together.

In retrospect, it would have been utterly disastrous to the economic development of our country if each state had not surrendered control of interstate commerce. Absent such surrender, the trade relationships between our states would be analogous to those within the European Common Market which has struggled for 30 years since the Treaty of Rome to achieve the economic advantages of the U.S. with respect to trade between its members without the corresponding political power to enforce its collective economic will.

Last year the President appointed me to the Committee on Trade Negotiations. This is a statutory body created by Congress to advise the President, the Congress and the U.S. Trade Representative on matters relating to world trade.

This Committee, of approximately 35 members, includes among its members CEO's of some of our largest manufacturing and banking corporations; some of the top representatives of organized labor; companies large and small with active interests in trade; and economists—a widely diversified group which by no means is always in agreement on all aspects of trade. This Committee is supported by about a thousand other people selectively drawn from the private sector to advise the Office of the Trade Representative on matters falling within their unique experience and expertise. After one year on the Committee, I have concluded that on matters relating to trade, our government is thoroughly, and I believe, well advised by the private sector.

EVOLUTION OF OUR TRADE POLICY

Throughout most of our history, the U.S. was relatively uninterested in world trade. Unlike England, Germany, France, Japan and others whose economies were trade dependent, some as much as 50%, we were almost exclusively interested in building our own economy. In essence, we sold only that part of our capacity that was excess to our domestic requirements. We imposed high tariffs to protect our so-called "infant industries." We imported only such manufactured products which could be competitive price-wise after they absorbed our tariffs.

During the 1920's we began to penetrate the world market primarily through the establishment of manufacturing subsidiaries as one means by which American companies could capitalize on their superior financial, manufacturing and marketing expertise.

The world economic crisis, which began in 1929 in the U.S. and extended to the whole of Europe, almost led to the complete collapse of world trade. The U.S. triggered this trade collapse when it enacted the Smoot-Hawley Law for the purpose of choking off imports by sharply increasing our tariffs.

A wave of reprisals followed this American decision. Switzerland answered by the complete boycott on American goods. Great Britain enacted tariffs for the first time in its history and abandoned its free trade policy, which for several hundred years was the economic cornerstone of its empire.

Most of the countries, including the U.S., devalued their currencies. This combination of trade barriers and devalued currencies led to a virtual stoppage in world trade. These negative experiences during the 1930's gave the impetus after World War II to the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), the International Monetary Fund, and the World Bank, to all of which the U.S. was a party.

In 1948 a new economic era began. World trade increased between 1948 and 1980 at an average annual growth rate in real terms of 7%; from less than $100 billion in 1948 to almost $2 trillion in 1980.

Our own trade rose from $19 billion to $460 billion in 30 years—a 50-fold increase.

Forty percent of our farm acreage is now planted for export. Four out of five jobs created between 1977 and 1982 were export related. It is estimated that for each increase of $1 billion in exports, 25 thousand American jobs are created.

But with the changing dynamics of the world trading system, the character of jobs changed. In 1960, for example, 37% of our work force was employed in manufacturing. By 1980, only 12% were engaged in manufacturing as such. However, during those 20 years we produced a lot more. But the jobs moved to small business, services, informatics, and so on, and we did well. In the 70's we created almost 20 million new jobs while our trading partners in Europe were losing nearly 3 million.

IDEOLOGICAL BASIS ON FREE TRADE

The ideological basis of free trade is an off-shoot of the doctrine of Adam Smith, who proclaimed that the common good could best be achieved by an economic system which induced each individual to pursue his own economic goals within the bounds of justice. These goals, he said, could best be achieved through free enterprise, competition, the market system and non-intervention by the state.

The trade correlatory of this doctrine was applied by his contemporary, David Ricardo, who set forth the basic case for the free trade system, namely, that it is to the advantage of nations to specialize in the production of goods and services in which they are relatively efficient and to import from other nations goods and services with which they are relatively inefficient. By adherence to this so-called law of comparative advantage, he said, nations could attain higher levels of real income and consumption than they could by acting in isolation.

The international market system as postulated by David Ricardo would require each producer of goods and services in the world to compete with all other producers in the world without intervention by his own or any other government.

The world market system was intended to provide a self-correcting mechanism to assure the most efficient use of societies' resources and would require each individual to manage his own affairs within the hard and brutal discipline of a free market.

OPTIONS AVAILABLE

With respect to our own trade policy, we have three options—"free trade," "fair trade," or "no trade."

I know of no case which can be made for a policy of no trade. Whether we like it or not, the world is highly interdependent with respect to raw materials, manufactured products, agriculture, and the recycling of capital throughout our world banking system. I can't conceive of any nation that could survive on a policy of no trade without committing national suicide or at the very least accepting a massive decline in its standard of living.

Second, I would reject free trade as an option if by free trade we mean unrestricted trade between the countries of the world—not because it is wrong in principle, but because, given the world as it is and will be for a long, long time, it is impractical and unrealistic.

The national defense implications of unrestricted trade are enormous. I can't conceive of any major country, including our own, gambling its survival on military products not substantially under its complete control. The implications to our national economy could be equally disastrous. Our vital industries would be "sitting ducks" for any nation, with unlimited power to tax, which could opt to subsidize selected industries and thus make it impossible for the private sector of its trading partners to compete.

The last option is that of fair trade. The word "fair" is a highly subjective word and, like beauty, is in the eye of the beholder. Fair trade it is trade based on reciprocity arising out of agreements negotiated between countries on the basis of their individual and common interest.

OUR TRADE POLICY

Fair trade, reciprocal trade, are the cornerstones of our national policy. Our government recognizes, I believe, that now, more than ever in our history, the U.S. has more at stake and more to gain from an open, expanding and fair international trading system than from a policy of relative economic isolation—as it were, drawing up our economic drawbridge to the rest of the world. Our policy assumes that fair trade is the glue that holds the open trading system together. The political consensus required to support that policy of fair trade depends on our ability to ensure that fairness remains the basis for competition in the world market.

Our policy is non-partisan. In its direction and thrust, this policy has been followed by all successive governments since the days of President Harry Truman.

Our trade policy is based on the assumption that the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), to which we are a party, will facilitate the further liberalization and expansion of world trade. GATT is a multilateral treaty subscribed to by 88 governments which together account for four-fifths of the world trade. GATT is the only multilateral instrument that lays down agreed upon rules for international trade.

GATT has been very effective in removing the visible barriers to trade, namely tariffs. These tariffs have been reduced progressively through 35 years of negotiations between the signatories to a point where the average tariff imposed on imports world-wide will be less than 4 percent by December 31, 1986.

GATT has not been effective in limiting non-tariff barriers which have been created by many countries in lieu of tariff barriers to enhance their own trading objectives. All governments intervene in international trade including our own. The removal of these tariff barriers by negotiation will be a greater test of statesmenship than the creation of the European Economic Community. These negotiations must be conducted in an atmosphere of mutual understanding of each others problems.

In these negotiations we have great unapplied leverage. We have in the United States the largest, open, and most attractive market in the world. We can use the leverage of denying access to our markets to any nation which refuses to accept trade reciprocity.

PROTECTIONISM

The principal current restraint on trade protectionism. This is practiced to a greater or lesser degree by most countries of the world, including our own. Our Trade Ambassador, Bill Brock, told us several months ago that everyone coming to his office with a request for protection, starts out by saying, "Bill, I am for free trade, but . . ."

One of the most subtle, but effective, restraints on trade is the establishment of quotas which, are permitted under the GATT rules but solely for the purpose of correcting temporary imbalances in trade.

I thought it would be helpful to examine the protectionist implications of the quotas on Japanese cars arising out of the "voluntary restraint agreement" entered into with the U.S. in 1981, under which Japan agreed to limit the export of its cars to the U.S. to approximately 1.8 million cars a year. This agreement was offered to the Japanese as the lesser of two evils, namely, acceptance of "voluntary quotas" or further inciting protectionist sentiment in the U.S., which could result in something worse for the Japanese.

Japan has increased its share of the U.S. market from less than 6% in 1971 to 21% in 1980, in a trading environment in which our automotive market was completely open. The quotas were intended to offer protection to the American automobile manufacturers during a period which would permit them to adjust to the conditions resulting from the oil shocks of the 70's. The agreement as extended expires March 31, 1985.

The allocation of these quotas is made by Japan to its manufacturers pretty much on the basis of market shares enjoyed in the U.S. before the quotas. The agreement imposes no control on the kinds of cars or options installed or on price. Interestingly enough, the majority by number of Japanese automobile manufacturers do not participate in this allocation.

As a matter of fact, Japanese cars sold in this country are priced at from ¼ to 2 times for the identical cars sold in Japan. These cars compete in the low-priced market which by now has been virtually ceded to the Japanese. These cars enjoy a reputation for high quality. Last year they ranked in the aggregate well above American cars on the index ratings of the Consumer Satisfaction Index. If quotas expire as now scheduled next March, most analysts predict that Japan, if it so elects, would have little trouble doubling its share of the American automobile market in just two year.

The demand for Japanese cars exceeds the supply—otherwise there would be no need for quotas. The prices charged domestically for these cars are adjusted upwards, not in relation to cost, but in relation to demand as in a free market.

Because of this artificial restraint on supply, American buyers pay prices which reflect the artificial scarcity of cars subject to the quotas. This permits the Japanese to increase prices in relation to the demand. The subsidy to our own car industry results from the effect of these higher prices on prices charged by domestic manufacturers at the higher end of the market.

For 1983 the automobile industry reported $6 billion in profits on sales of 6.8 million cars—only three years after it lost $4 billion on sales of just 400,000 less cars in 1980. It is estimated that the industry will earn $10 billion on slightly higher volume in 1984. If so, this would represent a profit swing, between 1980 and 1984, of $14 billion on slightly larger volume than the industry enjoyed in 1980.

The industry ascribes its remarkable comeback to the investment of some $50 billion in new facilities, lower breakeven points resulting from reductions in capacity of its plants, and improved cost and quality controls, a swing back in customer preference for the larger cars and, of course, the undisclosed effect on profits of the Japanese quotas.

This year the automobile industry will attempt to negotiate continuing labor agreements with the U.A.W. The employees of this industry, after steel, are now the second highest paid in the manufacturing sector. The wages of our auto workers are double those of their Japanese counterparts and 10 times those of the Koreans, who are not yet subject to "voluntary quotas" but who are making ready to invade the U.S. market.

The U.A.W., which has stated that it is "appalled" at the "excessive" bonuses paid industry executives, made possible by the high profits of the industry, will undoubtedly try to share in the largess of the manufacturers and will probably succeed. If so, this will make American cars less competitive cost-wise than they are now, and will undoubtedly trigger larger wage settlements among their suppliers and in other industries, all of which will add to the cost-push inflation from which we have just emerged.

The removal of quotas next year will be a very difficult political decision because one out of seven jobs is directly related to the automobile business. The Japanese, who reluctantly accepted the quotas in the first place, are happy with the present arrangement. And they ascribe this change of heart not to the high aggregate profits they enjoy on restricted volume, but to their newly arrived "understanding" of the problems facing the American car industry.

We currently have a negative trade balance with the Japanese of $30 billion—almost one-third of our total trade deficit. Removal of the car quotas could add materially to this negative balance. On the other hand, extension of the quotas will result in continuing consumer subsidies as long as the Japanese maintain their competitive edge at the lower end of the car market.

We have been exceedingly patient with the Japanese for a long time in negotiating access to their markets. They are a major beneficiary of our own automotive market, even though it is currently restricted to 1.85 million cars per year. Our efforts to date to persuade them to adopt a "level playing field" in our trade relationships generally have not been fruitful and, in my opinion, will not be unless we exploit a dramatic issue like access to our automotive market, limited or unlimited, to achieve fair trading opportunities in Japan and an acceptable balance of trade.

In seeking protection, industry can request direct subsidies which are financed by taxes, or request protectionist programs which represent more social cost in the aggregate. Industry obviously prefers quotas to tax-financed subsidies because the transfer of cost is made directly from the producer to the consumer and requires no direct government funding, which is politically more palatable.

Not all understand that the practice of awarding quotas generates far more cost to the American consumer than benefit to the protected groups. While protectionist policies do save jobs in the protected industries (at least in the short run), the cost to consumers is many times the benefits received by those whose jobs are "saved."

STRUCTURAL ADJUSTMENTS

A word about structural adjustments, which are caused by the loss of our domestic markets to foreign competition. These adjustments result in bankruptcies, mergers, downsizing of key industries, massive layoffs, and the need for reeducation and relocation of personnel who have been adversely affected.

All of us, regret the need for these structural adjustments and we would expect that business and government, particularly, will do everything reasonable to alleviate the pain to individuals resulting from these structural adjustments.

However, let me remind you that the market system, when applied to the world trading system, is intended to produce a self-correcting mechanism to assure the most effective use of societies' resources and that consequently each individual and corporation must manage their affairs under the discipline of a competitive market.

In this world nothing is constant but change—change in products, technology, investment and human enterprise. Those of us who have attained established positions in a market would like to freeze the present at a point in time. However, this is not possible within a market system where there are always winners and losers.

I don't want to seem to be callous about structural adjustments, and emphasize again, there is a major role for government to alleviate the major effects on individuals. But I must emphasize that the role of government is to deal with the adjustments humanely but in so doing not perpetuate the institutions which can not compete in a fair and free market.

Economic progress means economic turmoil. If we seek to avoid that turmoil at all cost, we will drain the life out of our economic system and set the stage not only for decline in our standard of living, but also for social turmoil of a much more destructive kind.

Let me leave you with some final thoughts:

All of us want to enjoy the benefits of an international free market system—for ourselves. Contrary-wise, most of us reject the system when our own competitive position is undermined.

In short, we as consumers enjoy the pleasure of the availability and lower price of imported goods of superior quality, but as producers we abhor the pain of losing market share to the more efficient foreign producer.

However, we have no logical choice but to maintain our competitive position in the world economy. We must continually adjust what we produce and what we export in response to market forces.

We must continue to support a multilateral trade framework for the further expansion of world trade. We must continue to develop ways and means to further expand world trade through GATT and through sectional and bilateral trade agreements in keeping with the spirit of GATT.

We should deny access to our markets to trading partners who limit our access to theirs. We must insist on a level playing field. Failing that, we must vigorously enforce our comprehensive trading laws to ensure that U.S. firms and workers are not unfairly disadvantaged by predatory actions of our trading partners.

We must dissolve over time our own trade barriers such as quotas and the like, but insist as a reciprocal condition that our trading partners do likewise.

Finally, we must support the President and his Trade Representative when they make the extraordinary difficult decisions which are required to balance the claims of special trade interests with the economic well-being of the nation.

The road ahead will be difficult, torturous, time consuming and will have many setbacks. However, we must keep our eye on the ball and like the monks of old, who pursued personal sanctity even though they knew it was not attainable in this mortal life, we must continue to pursue our national goal of fair trade because there is really no other rational choice.●

LALO SOLIS, A RARE, CARING, PRAYERFUL MAN

HON. HENRY B. GONZALEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, on June 11 a very wonderful and close friend of mine, Hilario G. (Lalo) Solis, Sr., passed away in our native city of San Antonio.

My friend, Lalo, a very rare, caring, and prayerful man, was a beacon in a developing area in San Antonio. He was the kind of person who bridged a cultural gap when people on each side of that human chasm were not as willing to reach out and bring about harmony, as Lalo was.

I would like to share with you, and my colleagues, the eulogy which was written and personally given by a great mutual friend of Lalo's and mine, Texarkana writer and former San Antonio journalist, James (Jim) Presley, at Lalo's funeral on June 15, 1984.

The eulogy is as follows, along with an obituary from the San Antonio Express:

EULOGY FOR HILARIO G. (LALO) SOLÍS, SR. (1902-84), CORDI-MARIAN VILLA CHAPEL, SAN ANTONIO, TX

(By James Presley)

Your Excellency, Reverend Fathers, Sisters, my cherished friends the members of the Solís family, and other assembled mourners: I am deeply honored that the Solís family asked me to say these words of love for Lalo Solís, Sr. He was my treasured friend, and I told him more than a few times that I thought of him as a father. We didn't have to explore the psychological significance of a father figure. He knew what I meant. He has been an important part of my life, and he always will be. Death cannot change that.

A constant theme in Lalo Solís's life and career was his deep interest in the betterment of people—all people—and his lifelong participation in politics was keyed to that abiding interest. He had a genuine, profound feeling for "the little man" and you didn't have to be around him long to realize this empathy.

The first time I ever saw Lalo Solís, I learned this. It was in 1958 at a political convention in Austin. I was a young Ph.D. student at the University of Texas, 28 years old, and Lalo that year would be twice my age, at 56—slightly older than I am now. I didn't know his name, but I couldn't miss him as he worked his way along the convention floor. A stout, greying, olive-complexioned man in his middle fifties with the shoulders of a stevedore, he stood out in that milling throng of business suits and white collars. Deliberately, he moved from group to group, from person to person, doggedly buttonholing delegates. A frown furrowed his brows into ridges. Sweat dampened his blue shirt at the armpits. His prominent Indian nose and rock-like jaw jutted forward as if carved from the granite on Mount Rushmore. His face symbolized intensity.

Lalo and others had gone to that convention hoping to gain an endorsement for Henry B. Gonzalez, then in the state senate, in his race for governor that summer. But Henry's was a controversial name at that time, for reasons that today may seem archaic to a younger generation. He had filibustered against a series of segregation bills in the Texas Senate and in 1958 that was not only a first, it had brought down the wrath of many Texans. And Henry was of Mexican descent. And he was a Catholic. Well, the issue in Austin that day finally boiled down to whether Henry would even be permitted to speak at the convention. That morning Henry had just got into town from Ralls, Texas, out on the Plains, and finally in the afternoon, as the hot late May sun cast long shadows outside the auditorium, he was invited to address the delegates for fifteen minutes. Henry made a passionate, moving appeal that snapped the, by then, listless delegates to their feet. I think it was the best speech I ever heard Henry Gonzalez make, maybe the best speech I've ever heard. In the next day's San Antonio Light there was a picture of Henry's being carried triumphantly through the tumult. If you go look up that picture, you'll see that one of the broad shoulders Henry rode on belonged to Lalo. Lalo's day had climaxed successfully, because Henry's had. That was how Lalo was—always there, reliable, hard-working, letting others take the limelight he labored to prepare.

I went to that convention to observe. I left as an enthusiast and I came to know Lalo—and Henry—well that summer because I joined the campaign, and rode all over this huge state of Texas, as Henry's press man, general jack-of-all-trades, and sometime driver. I had many long conversations with Lalo, and we were soon fast friends.

He told me one day that summer, "A lot of guys—some big shots—take one look at me, especially when I'm wearing my khakis, and they say, 'Well-l-l, what's this guy? He's just a truck driver!' and they don't think I know what I'm talking about. And that's right—I do drive a truck. But lots of times I've been right, when they weren't."

Lalo Solís was one of the true, unsung heroes of American politics. I soon learned that our long, tiring summer was only a chapter, for Lalo, in a larger, personal, continuing one-man campaign for a world free of discrimination. He had been, for a long time, doing something about prejudice in his own way, which he felt was the American way—through politics. The practice of politics, he knew, was too important to democracy for any American to ignore.

"Politics are good, if you play 'em clean," he told me. He insisted on "playing 'em clean" while at the same time being a tough competitor. Maury Maverick, Sr., once called him "my conscience."

Starting in politics in the 1930s, Lalo waited twenty years for his first victory as a campaign manager, when Henry Gonzalez won a seat on San Antonio's city council in 1953. Their friendship had begun a few years before when Gonzalez, a night school teacher, and Lalo, a truck driver for the school system, met during a coffee break.

"I told him," remembered Lalo, "if he ever had a friend running for public office, to let me know and I would help him. A few days later he told me he had filed for the state legislature. He asked me to be his campaign manager. 'Why don't you get someone who knows more about it?' I asked him. But he said he wanted me and I told him I would do my best. So we started and we campaigned from that night to the runoff without missing a single day. He had an old sedan and we spent $300 in all for the race, including the $100 filing fee."

Even in defeat the Gonzalez-Solís team had won, for Gonzalez became the first candidate of Mexican descent to reach the runoff in a local legislative election. It was the optimistic prelude to a series of successful Solís-coached campaigns. Soon his candidate for county commissioner, Albert Peña, Jr., was in the courthouse. Gonzalez went on to become the first Texas state senator of Mexican descent and, in 1961, the first such man in Texas to become a Congressman.

Race, culture, creed, education, bank account meant nothing to Lalo in judging a man. "Will he keep his word? Can you trust him?" he wanted to know. He was short on theory; about practical democracy he knew more than many an intellectual with a Ph.D. degree. No doubt that was why his admirers at St. Mary's University bestowed a Doctor of Politics honorary degree upon him.

Archbishop Flores has eloquently impressed upon us the lasting importance of fathers and mothers and the family. With seven children of his own, Lalo had plenty of experience as a father. During that first summer I knew him, he never lost contact with his wife Teresa and their family while he politicked nights, weekends, and on vacation from his truck-driving job with the school district. Late at night, wherever we were, he called home by long distance to make sure they were all well. His oldest daughter then was 25, his youngest son 9. On one occasion when he called at midnight there was no answer. He called the next-door neighbors. They didn't know where his family was. His frown deepened; his face was grave. He had the operator keep calling. Finally his wife answered. She and the children had just returned from a bingo to raise money for Henry's campaign. Lalo, relieved, grinned. Minutes later he was peacefully asleep.

He fell asleep, that is, after giving thanks that his family was safe and well. Each night, whether we stayed in a motel or a private home, he knelt by his bed, as a child might, and prayed for a few minutes. The first time I saw him do it, I was quite surprised, but only for a moment. With Lalo, it was something you accepted immediately as a genuine, organic part of him.

In an era when promises too often are lightly proffered and just as lightly forgotten, he was a rarity. He kept his promises to God and man. His handshake was as binding as any iron-clad contract, and his relationship with this Creator went even deeper than I at first realized. I had observed his invariably declining all alcoholic beverages wherever we went in 1958. "I don't drink," he explained with an amiable, but firm, grin. His favorite drink was strawberry pop. Then one evening when a host persisted in offering him "just one drink," Lalo elaborated, "I made a promise to God I wouldn't drink."

Sometime later I asked him about this. We were sitting in his favorite domino hall on West Commerce, El Retiro, where everyone but he was drinking beer. He seemed to stare into the faraway as he recalled a week of medical crisis early in his marriage. He and his wife had already lost their first-born child and now another loss seemed near.

"It was in 1936," he said. "My baby who was 22 months old was sick. She had to have a blood transfusion. They took blood from my wife because their blood types matched better. I couldn't give blood, but I wanted to do something to help my baby get well. I prayed. I didn't know at first what to offer God. Well, I used to like to drink then. So I promised Him I wouldn't drink any more."

Their daughter Frances survived and the Solís family steadily grew until in all there were four daughters and three sons. One daughter became a nun. In one of the last conversations I had with Lalo, during one of the visits I made to the nursing home, we talked of his family, and he told me how proud he was of his children, his grandchildren, and his beloved and devoted wife Teresa. "I've got a good wife, too—good wife to help me run things," he said in his characteristic understatement.

Growing up, Lalo and his friends suffered widespread discrimination. Born Hilario García Solís in San Antonio in 1902, he was the fourth of eight children born to immigrants from Mexico. Signs in cafe windows when he was young warned, "No Dogs or Mexicans Allowed." He knew first-hand what it is to be an underdog. He first learned English in the public schools of San Antonio where he quit to go to work before he entered high school.

He liked to speak Spanish. "We taught all the kids Spanish first; then they learned English in school. Then they can have both Spanish and English. At home, we always use Spanish. That's good. Lots of people don't want their children to speak Spanish." It wasn't that way in his family.

As a young man he wandered as a laborer through the Middle West and then eastward as far as Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Because he was fluent in English he became an interpreter when working with other Mexican-Americans, which earned him a higher wage. Toward the end of World War I he served in the Army. When World War II broke out he was married, with a family, and too old to be drafted, but he volunteered and served anyway. He was a patriot in the truest sense of that often-abused word.

Though segregation was an anathems to him Lalo once revealed to me he had requested to be "segregated" on one occasion in the Army. He said, grinning, "In the Army we Mexicans used to eat with those guys from Tennessee and Kentucky, and we didn't get anything to eat. We weren't used to eating fast like they were. Those hillbillies were eating up everything! We were about to starve. So one day we told the mess sergeant we would like to eat by ourselves."

Otherwise, segregation was un-American to him. My mind goes back to those coffee-drinking sessions we used to have at Tony Kawazoe's Cafe on the West Side. Lalo would call G.J. Sutton to join us. Tony would sit at our table and we would talk politics. An outsider might have said we symbolized some sort of cultural ecumenicalism. Each of us represented a distinct segment of our America: Lalo, a chicano; G.J., a Negro; Tony, of Japanese descent; I, a white Anglo of Scotch-Irish and other blends, a bona fide WASP. What a terrific fusion ticket we might have fielded in the right city!

Nearing retirement, his seven children grown and he a silver-haired grandfather in his mid-sixties, Lalo and his wife Teresa bought a little downtown cafe of their own. To no one's surprise, Lalo's Cafe displayed political banners and placards along with culinary specials. The cooking, under the direction of Mrs. Solís, was definitely, authentically Mexican, but, typically, his candidates faced no racial or cultural tests, whether they were chicano, Anglo, Black, or, as in one case, Chinese.

There was only one catch, personally for me, to eating at Lalo's Cafe. He never permitted me to pay for a meal. Never. Politely, but firmly, he refused my money.

"We think of you as one of the family, Jim," he said. A governor or a President couldn't have made me feel so important.

In closing, I would like to share one last vignette from this long and useful life. It was a hot August day in 1962 when my wife Fran and I lived in San Antonio, just before we moved to Texarkana. Lalo had dropped by our apartment, and he and I were drinking coffee under the air-conditioner. As was inevitable when Lalo was around, we were talking politics.

The telephone rang. I listened for several moments, in disbelief. I mumbled something to the effect that my wife and I would be there as soon as we could. I hung up the phone and turned to Lalo.

"My mother's been critically injured in an automobile accident."

"What can I do, Jim?" he asked, his dark eyes large and wide.

There was nothing I could think of. Finally I said, "You can light a candle."

He nodded, in that intense, decisive way of his.

"I'll ask my daughter the nun to pray for her."

As my wife and I hurriedly prepared to go, as it turned out, to my mother's funeral in Texarkana, I did not immediately recognize the significance of this simple, typical act: Lalo, a devout Catholic who practiced brotherhood without preaching it, asking his Catholic daughter to pray for my Baptist mother—as if she were "one of the family."

These are but a few of the memories we will carry through the years of you, Lalo, my dear friend. Your love for your wife and family and friends will survive you. We gather here today, Mrs. Solís, and Frances, Sister Philip, Florence, Lalo Jr., Theresa, John, and Benny, to say publicly what we feel in our hearts—that we also love Lalo and that our lives are the better for it. He has become a part of us. We extend our sympathy and our love to you in this time of grief. We understand your loss, for it is also ours. But we are experiencing more than loss. We also have gained from this life, and we celebrate our gains today. For Lalo leaves us a rich heritage that persists, that continues to be a part of us, that lives in us. It will not die until we let it die. These memorably positive qualities that we celebrate in his life we also can pass on to others, so that on a day like this, in a far year, when we reach a place like this, someone will remember that we, too, in our way helped make the world a little better and that we passed on some of these qualities. That is one of the reasons we are here today.

Farewell, dear friend. Adios, Lalo.

"LALO" SOLIS, EX-CAMPAIGN MANAGER

One night in the late 1940s a moonlighting security guard at Sidney Lanier High School walked up to a teacher named Henry B. Gonzalez and a relationship with resounding effects was born.

The security guard was Hilario G. "Lalo" Solis.

"He walked up to me and said, 'I hear you're running for something'," U.S. Rep. Gonzalez recalled, "That started a long relationship between us."

Solis teamed up with Gonzalez and became his first campaign manager. By the time he retired from politics, Solis had become known to elected officials from across the nation as a respected advisor and counselor who knew how to relate to people.

Solis died Sunday at age 81.

"I'm very grieved and saddened by his death," Gonzalez said. "He started out with me when I didn't have any resources. He was an original."

Solis helped Gonzalez overcome his doubt about getting into politics and acted as his mentor.

"He was like a father, brother and friend to me all at the same time," Gonzalez recalled. "He was my teacher and my friend."

Solis was the fourth child in a family of eight and never made it to high school. As a young boy, he shined shoes on Houston Street for 13 hours a day and made only $3.50 a week.

But as long as he could support his family, Solis was content—and distance was no obstacle. He once traveled to Pennsylvania to work in the steel mills. He later joined migrant workers picking cotton.

He worked for the San Antonio School District as a bus driver for 25 years.

One of the highlights of Solis' career was when he was chosen to attend the 1968 Democratic National Convention.

"He symbolized the gentleman with Indian features, representing the old school where a handshake was a person's word," Gonzales said. "He cared about the community and most of all about the people."

A rosary will be recited at 7:30 p.m. Thursday at Christ the King Catholic Church. A funeral Mass will be celebrated at 12:30 p.m. Friday in Cardi Marion Villa Chapel with burial to follow in Resurrection Cemetery.●

CONDEMNS FARRAKHAN STATEMENT

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to condemn Mr. Louis Farrakhan, leader of the Nation of Islam Church, for calling Judaism "a gutter religion" and the existence of the State of Israel, "an outlaw act." I call on all my colleagues to do the same.

We cannot remain silent in the face of these vicious remarks of hatred. Mr. Farrakhan's anti-Semitic words are completely unacceptable, and cannot be permitted to pass in the public arena unchallenged. I call on all advocates of basic human rights to unite in open and total repudiation of Mr. Farrakhan and his offensive public pronouncements. His statements about religions and beliefs other than his own demonstrate a profound disrespect for basic American values. We must, in language that is crystal clear, ally ourselves unequivocally against this type of activity.●

TRIBUTE TO PROF. JOHN STEDMAN

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay homage to a former law professor and dear friend of mine, John Stedman, who is no longer with us. Over the nearly 25 years that I have served in Congress, and during the almost 15 years that I have chaired the House Judiciary Subcommittee with jurisdiction of John's area of expertise—patent, trademark and copyright law—I relied on John more than any other professor in this country. I sought John's advice not only for its legal scholarship but also for its insight into human nature.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the great service that John rendered to the University of Wisconsin Law School, the State of Wisconsin, and the Federal Government, including the U.S. Congress. He educated thousands of students, including myself; he authored almost 40 law review articles; he wrote numerous legislative memorandums and testified on many occasions before subcommittees, State and congressional; he was editor of a series of 30 studies on patent law for the Senate Judiciary Committee; he served with distinction in the U.S. Department of Justice; he was active in the copyright revision process that was an all-consuming subject before my subcommittee in the mid-1970's; and finally he devoted himself tirelessly to numerous pro bono activities.

When I think about John today, I think most about his commitment to the public interest. In real life terms, John dedicated himself to a life of public service. From a philosophical perspective, his guiding principle was that all legal institutions and every legal reform must be evaluated in light of its advancement of the public good.

I also think much about John as a person. Let me quote to you a statement made about John by Prof. John Kidwell of the University of Wisconsin Law School; this statement provides an apt and accurate description of John Stedman:

A remarkable thing about John Stedman, though, is that if you ask people who knew him and his work what they remember most vividly about him, they speak first not about his fine teaching, or his exemplary scholarship, but rather of what an extraordinarily gentle person John was. He was a man of exceptional balance and perspective. He was a person with great compassion, who always revealed his concern for others in the respect he showed them. He was scrupulously fair. In addition, he had a great sense of humor and revealed it in his writing, as well as in conversation. All of these traits made him a valued member of the university community; his balance and fairness led to requests that he serve on innumerable committees. He was always ready to help a student or colleague and never asked for the credit he so richly deserved.

In remembrance of John but also for his fine wife, Patricia—known to her friends as Pat—I would like to insert in the RECORD the text of an article that I recently authored for publication in the University of Wisconsin Law Review. I recommend a reading of these written thoughts to my colleagues not only because they reflect upon a good man but also because they are relevant to those of us who have chosen, like John Stedman, a life of public service.

JOHN C. STEDMAN—IN REMEMBRANCE

(By Robert W. Kastenmeier*)

I knew John Stedman for more than thirty years: first as my law teacher and second as a fellow lawyer. During that time, John became a cherished and dear personal friend. I grew to know and respect him not only as a legal scholar, but also as a trusted confidant. He was a man of great personal integrity and as an individual with a heightened sense of fairness. John possessed that wonderful (especially to those of us in the legal profession) combination of commitment to the rule of law and compassion for his fellow man. His gentle demeanor, his modesty, and his warmth were reflective of his perspective of the world.

The legal and teaching professions need more individuals like John Stedman; yet they are hard to find. That is why those of us who knew John are all the more appreciative of him.

During the past three decades, the University of Wisconsin Law School has had many distinguished teachers: some have produced brilliant works of legal scholarship; some have excelled in the classroom; some have devoted themselves to improving rule of law nationally; some have worked toward reforming the laws of the State of Wisconsin; some have committed themselves to the public interest; and some have devoted themselves to governmental service. Over the years, John Stedman was committed to and excelled in all of these roles.

Having had approximately twenty-five years of experience in the United States Congress, and also having chaired, for almost fifteen years, a House Judiciary Subcommittee [1] that much interested John, I would be hard pressed to list the countless times that I sought his professional and personal advice. John testified on numerous occasions, he corresponded regularly, he was always available on the telephone, and when in Washington, D.C., he usually stopped by my office. In short, during my tenure in Congress, I relied on John more than perhaps anyone else on the University of Wisconsin law faculty.

John was a unique resource. However, he was more than just a legal advisor to be asked a question about a judicial decision or a proposed legislative reform. He was a fresh and independent thinker, a trait particularly unusual in a world of special interests and pressure to conform. John was a navigator to be consulted about which direction to go, and whether to proceed with dispatch or deliberation. John possessed all the skills necessary for a policy maker. Most importantly, he was always practical and realistic in terms of what was politically achievable. This skill made him particularly helpful to the legislative process.

Today, when I reflect on John, I think most of all about his commitment to the public interest and to those in our society who are not sufficiently powerful to make the present legal rules truly reflective of their needs. A career in the law by necessity directs most lawyers toward the relatively narrow goal of representing a client in a particular case. Most lawyers do not have to think about the overall needs of our legal system, and the relative relationship between the haves and the have nots.

John Stedman, however, always emphasized the general democratic goals of our governmental system. Listen to his words written nearly four decades ago:

*Member of Congress, 1958 to present; LL.B., University of Wisconsin, 1952.

[1] The House Judiciary Committee Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice has jurisdiction of many items, including patents, trademarks, and copyright.

"Despite an occasional mystic who persists in viewing our patent system as a sacred cow, not to be touched, much less slaughtered, I take it there is no serious challenge today of the proposition that the patent system has for its primary purpose the advancement of the public interest and that it must be evaluated in the light of that interest—and, if necessary, changed to promote it." [2]

John repeated similar thoughts not only in the context of patent law, but also in the context of copyright law,[3] and lest we forgot John's rather simple commandment, he always reminded us of it.[4]

This country, the State of Wisconsin, and the University of Wisconsin will miss John Stedman dearly. Hopefully, however, his message, now firmly rooted, will endure.●

INTRODUCTION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION DESIGNATING NOVEMBER 1984 AS "NATIONAL CHRISTMAS SEAL MONTH"

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, among the fastest rising causes of death in our country are chronic obstructure pulmonary diseases. These diseases, including asthma, chronic bronchitis, emphysema and lung cancer, do not discriminate as to age, race, or sex. More than 17 million Americans, including 2 million childhood sufferers of asthma, are afflicted with chronic diseases of the lung. The statistics are frightening. One out of every twelve Americans suffers from these diseases at a cost to the Nation of more than $29.4 billion annually in medical expenses, lost wages, and lost productivity.

One of the ways to combat these diseases is through research; another is public education. Both of these methods are funded by Christmas Seals, a fundraising effort started by the American Lung Association in 1907. The association, its medical section, the American Thoracic Society, and its 144 federated associations throughout the country, are dedicated to the control and prevention of all lung diseases and related causes such as smoking, air pollution, and occupational hazards.

This voluntary effort is essential to protect the public health. For this reason, I have introduced a House joint resolution which designates the month of November 1984 as "National Christmas Seal Month."

I call upon my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this resolution and helping to assure its adoption.

JOINT RESOLUTION DESIGNATING THE MONTH OF NOVEMBER 1984, AS "NATIONAL CHRISTMAS SEAL MONTH"

Whereas among the fastest rising causes of death in our country are chronic obstructive pulmonary diseases. More than seven million Americans, among them over two million children, suffer from asthma. More than two million of our people have emphysema. Almost eight million Americans suffer from chronic bronchitis. Before the end of this decade it is projected that deaths from lung cancer will surpass breast cancer as the leading cause of cancer deaths among American women.

Whereas one out of 12, or more than 17 million Americans are afflicted with chronic diseases of the lung. The consequence is more than 225,000 deaths annually, with a cost to the Nation of more than $29.4 billion in medical expenses, lost wages and untold dollars in lost productivity.

Whereas the American Lung Association—The Christmas Seal people—is a nonprofit public health organization supported by individual contributions to Christmas Seals and other donations. It is this Nation's first national voluntary health organization. Founded in 1904 to combat tuberculosis, today the Association, its medical section the American Thoracic Society and its 144 federated associations throughout the country, are dedicated to the control and prevention of all lung diseases and some of their related causes. These include smoking, air pollution and occupational lung hazards.

Whereas since 1907, Christmas Seals have been used by the Association to raise funds through private contributions, to pioneer and develop health education programs in our schools. The tradition remains strong. This year, 60 million homes will receive Christmas Seals.

Whereas this year, the Association is conducting a new public education program, "Marijuana: A Second Look"—which is targeted to 9, 10, and 11 year-old children. It is not waiting until marijuana smokers suffering from profound lung diseases before it acts. The program is teaching America's youth about the hazards of marijuana smoke to lungs. Once again, the Association is taking a leadership role in protecting this country's lung health.

Whereas through its community lung Associations, the American Lung Association helps educate the public, patients and their families about all forms of lung diseases and their causes, and sponsors community action programs. In the past decade, it has provided more than $10.8 million for research programs specifically designed to investigate prevention and control of lung diseases. It has pioneered in the development of self-management programs as an adjunct to medical care of asthma both for children and adults. And it conducts vigorous campaigns against cigarette smoking and air pollution: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of November, 1984, is designated "National Christmas Seal Month". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all Government agencies, educational, philanthropic, scientific, medical, health care organizations and professionals, and the people of the United States to observe that month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

HONDA OF AMERICA CELEBRATES 25th ANNIVERSARY IN UNITED STATES

HON. MICHAEL G. OXLEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, Honda of America this month celebrates its 25th anniversary in the United States. On June 4, 1959, on Pico Boulevard in Los Angeles, CA, Honda began production of its first American-built motorscooter, the Supercub. This production represented Honda's first $200,000 investment in the United States.

Since that time, Honda of America has developed into a fully integrated part of Honda's worldwide production. I am particularly proud of Honda of America's investment since, just last week, ground was broken for Honda's new $30 million motorcycle engine assembly plant near Anna, OH, located in my district.

This new engine plant will initially employ 150 local workers to produce motorcycle engines for motorcycles assembled in Marysville, OH. If initial production goes well—and I have every reason to believe it will—Honda may possibly expand this facility to build automobile engines for the Honda Accord, also assembled in Marysville. This new plant, coupled with the hundreds of contracting and subcontracting jobs in the area, is indeed good economic news.

I bring this to the attention of my colleagues as a prime example of how two-way trade does work in an unrestricted world marketplace. The new engine plant brings Honda of America's total investment in production to almost $600 million in the United States—no token investment by any stretch of the imagination. But this investment is by no means limited to the Midwest region. In addition to Honda's origin in California, Honda will open its production doors later this summer to its new power products division in North Carolina.

Ohio and other States represent the future of Honda and, indeed, the future trend of international manufacturing. It is important to point out that our foreign investors value our skilled and principled work force, and

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP URGED TO HONOR ROGER B. CHAFFEE, VIRGIL I. GRISSOM, AND EDWARD H. WHITE

HON. HAROLD S. SAWYER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, June 26, 1984, I introduced a resolution, House Resolution 537 urging the U.S. Postal Service to issue a postage stamp honoring astronauts Roger B. Chaffee, Virgil I. Grissom, and Edward H. White. As you will recall, these astronauts were the victims of the worst tragedy in the U.S. space program. The prime crew of the first Apollo mission was killed during prelaunch tests of their Apollo 204 spacecraft on the launch pad on January 27, 1967.

The tragic deaths of the Apollo 1 team at then Cape Kennedy did not deter the Nation from pushing forward its efforts to explore space. However, it did delay the efforts for 1½ years in order to ensure the safety of our astronauts in the future. In a statement on the fire that killed the three Apollo astronauts, President Johnson said, "Three valiant young men have given their lives in the Nation's service. We mourn this great loss and our hearts go out to them."

Although the program continued after the accident, many design changes were made in the command module, and the public began rethinking its commitment to manned spaceflight. The Apollo Program was ultimately successful in attaining its objective of landing men on the Moon and returning them to Earth, but not before the three astronauts had lost their lives.

I feel this stamp would be a great honor to these men and their families. Theirs was a sacrifice that has had numerous effects on our daily lives and on the future of our country and space exploration. Much of our advanced technology that is becoming commonplace in our homes is a direct result of our space program and its many years of experimentation.

Another reason for my interest in the issuance of a commemorative stamp is that one of the astronauts has been a hero in my district since before the accident. Roger B. Chaffee was a native of Grand Rapids, MI. He was a Navy lieutenant commander and at 31, was the second youngest astronaut at that time. His parents, Mr. and Mrs. Don Chaffee, still live in Grand Rapids and like his father, Roger had been an aircraft pilot. While Grissom and White were veterans of other space missions, Apollo 1 would have been Lieutenant Commander Chaffee's first trip into space. Until being selected for the first Apollo crew, Chaffee lived with his wife and two children in Texas and he spent most of his time in the Apollo branch of the Houston Space Flight Center, working on flight control communications and instrument projects for the Apollo program.

Originally, the idea of a postage stamp came to me through Congressman MICHAEL BARNES of Maryland. He had a constituent, Mr. Joseph Knauer, that has spent the past 7 years contacting many people asking for their help in getting a commemorative stamp issued for these three astronauts. I hope that Mr. Knauer's perseverance will pay off and that a stamp will be issued with the help of my resolution.●

SOVIETS EXPLOIT EAST EUROPEAN SATELLITES

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, for the past decade, the Soviet Union has been approaching an economic crisis of potentially disasterous proportions. After more than 25 years of fueling economic growth with its seemingly boundless supplies of labor and raw materials, the Soviet Union's accessible resources are drying up. Though tremendously well endowed with fuels, metals, and minerals, the majority of Russia's remaining resources are buried under a thick layer of permafrost. To resolve the problems caused by wasteful and irresponsible resources expenditure, Moscow has come up with a plan, Socialist integration, which represents a quantum leap in Moscow's efforts to exploit the East European economies for the advancement of the Soviet state.

According to this scheme, which is embodied in over 200 multilateral agreements and has produced only a handful of joint ventures to date, the East Europeans are to devote a portion of their economies to the development of Soviet natural resource capacities. In addition to increasing production of the equipment and goods necessary for the undertaking, the satellite countries are being compelled to help finance the development. Futhermore, they are under tremendous pressure to adapt their production structures to ensure the most efficient use of these resources once they become available. In effect the Socialist countries are handing over a portion of their precious investment resources, scarce hard currency credits, and limited industrial capacity, so that their economies may be restructured to allow the Soviets to specialize in energy-intensive industrial production. Though Moscow has been effective in using its carefully cultivated trade surplus as an instrument of coercion—since 1975 Soviet export prices to the Communist bloc have more than quadrupled while Socialist import price increases have been suppressed—the 142 divisions of the Red army stationed throughout Eastern Europe has undoubtedly played the key role in obtaining acquiescense.

The terms of East European participation in these joint ventures belie the mutually advantageous propaganda billing. The satellite countries grant the Soviet Union 12- to 15-year loans, mostly in the form of machinery and equipment, at 2- to 3-percent interest. These loans are to be repaid in raw materials from the unit jointly built after the completion of the project. Thereafter the participating country is to benefit from a guaranteed supply of resources for a specified period of time. To the Soviets the gains are obvious: expanded transport capacity, a machine inventory that can be used on other projects, imports of Western technology bought with East European credits, increased construction experience and technological know-how, and of course, development of previously inaccessible resource capacity. The costs to the East Europeans is equally obvious, for these generous investors will not even receive privileged prices for the subsequent deliveries. Not only are they often forced to lend at rates well below those of the international money market, they will be paying twice for the development expenses via Soviet market prices.

Yet economic salvation is not the extent of the benefits reaped by Moscow. The political and strategic value of Socialist integration is of at least equal magnitude. Because the plan links the long-term development of Soviet primary resources to structural adaptations in East European economies, it will require the unification of Socialist 5-year plans, and by logical extension, the annual plans. Essentially the Soviet Union is establishing a supranational planning body that will give it operational control of East European production decisions. Furthermore, as there are no joint ownership or management provisions, the supplies are guaranteed, once the loan is repaid, only by the goodwill of Moscow. Clearly the Soviets seek to extend their economic leverage in Europe by fostering a vital dependence.

Not only is this plan for Socialist integration a vivid demonstration of the Soviet Union's willingness to bleed its satellites without regard to their domestic conditions, it is a statement of policy. Economic gain and political control achieved through coercion and intimidation is not a policy of alliance and mutual assistance, it is one of subjugation and exploitation. It is a historical lesson well worth remembering.●

DEMOCRACY ENDOWMENT

HON. HANK BROWN

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting a copy of a letter I received from the Chamber of Commerce Center for International Private Enterprise regarding comments I made recently on the House floor regarding the National Endowment for Democracy.

The questions many of us have regarding NED do not involve the motives of those involved with that institution. I am sure those individuals are well intentioned. No one I know is against spreading democracy. The question is whether NED can do this effectively and, second, whether it is up to the American taxpayer to pay for it.

The House is on record as opposing further funding for NED, which is comprised of institutes of the chamber of commerce, the AFL-CIO, and the two U.S. political parties. The Senate yesterday by a 2-to-1 vote decided to eliminate funding for the two political party institutes. I urge my colleagues to maintain the House position in conference to control runaway spending.

CENTER FOR INTERNATIONAL PRIVATE ENTERPRISE,
Washington, DC, June 28, 1984.

Hon. HANK BROWN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. BROWN: I am writing this letter because of my concern that your remarks delivered to the House on June 21, 1984, were misleading, in some cases incorrect, and could give any reader a very mistaken impression of what the Center for International Private Enterprise (CIPE) is attempting to accomplish. In particular, I would like to take this opportunity to set the record straight concerning the travel that was conducted by CIPE staff members with funds from the National Endowment for Democracy.

CIPE was established by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, through its National Chamber Foundation, to implement the business portion of the National Endowment for Democracy Act. CIPE's goal is to work with counterpart business groups and others abroad to build their effectiveness and promote the philosophy and reality of free enterprise. Enclosed is a brochure providing additional details on CIPE and its purposes.

We believe that, if CIPE is to have a responsibility for working with counterpart organizations abroad, it must identify them and assess both their willingness to cooperate and ability to perform well any cooperative projects that are agreed upon. This is a process that we are only just beginning. To attempt to do this exclusively from Washington would, in my opinion, be insufficient.

One of our primary goals is to work with existing business organizations to assess their interest and capability in cooperating with CIPE in pursuit of the goals of the NED legislation. In this context, we deemed it important in the early stages of our efforts to visit with leading officials of multilateral business organizations, review areas of possible cooperation, and assess the appropriateness of these organizations for future cooperation. Most of our early trips were created with this institution-building end in sight. Furthermore, these trips gave us an opportunity to meet with representatives of a large number of business organizations primarily from developing countries. Let me briefly list each trip and its purposes:

1. The April trip to Jamaica to which you referred was primarily intended to attend a session organized by the International Organization of Employers (IOE) for employers' organizations throughout the Caribbean Basin area. It was an excellent opportunity to reach a large number of business organizations in a variety of countries without having to make separate longer and more expensive trips to each one of these countries. That trip also gave us an opportunity to observe first-hand a proposal to support a project for a business organization in Jamaica.

2. Two members of the CIPE staff, including myself, and the Chairman of the CIPE Executive Council have just returned from separate trips to Europe.

a. The Geneva visit was to meet with representatives of employers' organizations affiliated with the International Organization of Employers currently attending the International Labor Organization (ILO) meeting in Geneva. It had nothing to do, as your remarks last Thursday implied, with "preaching democracy to the Government of Switzerland."

b. The visit to Paris was to meet with senior staff of the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) and its International Bureau of Chambers of Commerce (IBCC). The latter is responsible for building relations between chambers of commerce of the developed countries and the developing countries. That visit was in the context of the triennual meeting of the ICC and the IBCC in Stockholm a week later.

c. In Stockholm, at the IBCC meeting, I delivered a presentation explaining CIPE and its purposes and urged those present to assess whether their organizations might be interested in cooperating with CIPE in future programs. (I enclose a copy of my presentation for your information.) There were delegations from over 30 developing countries at this meeting. While in Stockholm, our delegation met with officials of the IBCC to see whether that organization would be interested in broadening its role to incorporate the kinds of priorities that have been identified in the NED legislation.

d. Neither of these visits was related to instructing the Government of France or the Government of Sweden on democracy, as your remarks implied.

e. The visit to Brussels was to meet with the umbrella business organization to the European Community and other business groups with the goal of assessing the extent to which there might be counterpart organizations there interested in pursuing goals similar to those that Congress has established in the NED legislation.

f. Finally, I would note that you omitted visits to Bonn. These gave us the opportunity to meet with several of the experienced political foundations in Germany that are involved in institution-building programs similar to those intended with the creation of the NED. We have much to learn from their efforts. I was particularly anxious to learn how these groups address some of the business and private enterprise goals that CIPE will be pursuing.

By the way, let me note that the Chairman of the Executive Council of CIPE attended the Stockholm meeting at his own expense and not at CIPE expense.

It is quite wrong to view this effort as one that has been created to allow a few select staff people to travel more throughout the world. You would make it sound as if we were on juants rather than hard-working trips. In fact, these trips are often made at some expense to, rather than benefit for, our personal lives. For this reason, I think you do both the institutions and the individuals involved an injustice by your June 21 remarks.

By establishing the Center for International Private Enterprise, an important message has been sent to our friends abroad. The message is simple—American business stands ready to provide meaningful support to the growing global interest in private enterprise and free societies. It was that message which my colleagues and I carried abroad in the last few weeks.

Thank you very much for your consideration. If you have any questions, please don't hesitate to be in touch with us.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL A. SAMUELS,
Vice Chairman and Acting Executive Director.●

THE NATIONAL CEMETERY SYSTEM

HON. JOHN McCAIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which will take a very large step in providing for the expansion and improvement of the National Cemetery System and better meet the needs of our Nation's veterans.

The National Cemetery System, as we know it today, was formulated in 1973 with the passage of the National Cemeteries Act. As a result of this act, along with a study by the Veterans' Administration, the State Cemetery Grants Program and the regional cemetery concept was adopted. The State Cemetery Grant Program is a Federal matching fund grant-in-aid program designed to assist States in the establishment, expansion, and improvement of veterans' cemeteries. The regional cemetery concept provided for the establishment of 1 large national cemetery in each of the 10 standard Federal regions, and 1 in Washington, DC. Unfortunately, this concept has not provided adequate service to the entire standard Federal region.

Of the 109 national cemeteries only 57 are in open status for the interment of first family members. The remaining 52 are closed and provide for limited local service through interring family members in already occupied gravesights. It is estimated that 18.5 million, or 66 percent of all living veterans, do not have reasonable access to an open national cemetery. Under its present structure with known progressive closings of national cemeteries, the National Cemetery System will not provide access to burial benefits for the veteran community to the degree consistent with the commitments, obligations, and responsibilities incumbent upon the Veterans' Administration.

The legislation I am introducing today will require the Administrator of the VA to determine areas of the Nation which have the greatest need for additions to the National Cemetery System. Furthermore, the Administrator will be required to rank such areas and devise a plan for the establishment of cemeteries in at least those 10 areas with the greatest need.

Mr. Speaker, to locate national cemeteries at these identified optimum locations will maximize the effectiveness of the program to a degree which is directly proportionate to the extent to which the concept is developed. The "establishment by need" concept remains the only equitable method for expansion to meet the needs of the veteran community as a whole.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure.●

DEFENDING OUR FREEDOMS: THE FAITH OF AN AMERICAN SERVICEMAN

HON. NEWT GINGRICH

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to present to my colleagues in the House an inspiring and touching story of one of the brave men who defends our great Nation.

Ens. Robert Roloff serves aboard the USS Garcia and recently wrote home to his church. Portions of his letter were reprinted in the local newspaper, and I feel it deserves even greater attention.

Ensign Roloff is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Roloff of Bremen, GA. They live in the district I represent. His dedication and devotion to his religious convictions and to our Nation makes him an inspiration to us all. We in the Sixth District of Georgia are proud of the faith and courage shown by Ensign Roloff. The text of the article follows:

ROLOFF WRITES HOME

(By Mary Reid)

In today's complex society, certain things require that families be separated at times. Possibly the worse time to be away from family is during the holiday season. A young man from our county is presently serving with the U.S. Navy on board ship in the Mediterranean Sea which necessitated his absence during the past Christmas season.

Robert B. Roloff, son of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Roloff of Bremen, received a commission as Ensign upon completion of his B.S. degree from Georgia Tech in 1982 and was a honor graduate from Haralson County High in 1978.

From abroad ship the USS Garcia, he wrote the following to the members of the District Line United Methodist Church:

"With the passing of the Christmas season, my thoughts turn to home. I was thirteen years old when we moved to Haralson County. It hardly seems possible that it is ten years later and I am 23. District Line 'adopted' me from the start and has supported me thru the teens and going away to school. It was wonderful to receive the Christmas card from thousands of miles away with all your signatures.

"Be proud of the American men abroad. The people that work with me and for me are all professionals. Our presence here is an insurance that free people everywhere can worship the Lord and allow Him to work thru His people; People like you."

After listening to the evening news and hearing about the service men who are endangering their lives in the Middle East, a letter from a local boy brings the far away trouble closer to home.

Mrs. Roloff, Robert's mother, said, "His work is classified. We don't really know where he is at any given time. He is the electronic material officer on board ship."

In a letter to his mother, Roloff writes, "This time I spend away from home is very difficult, but I finally reconciled the situation in my own mind. The freedoms and liberties that we possess in our country are and were never free or cheap. They had to be earned if we are to maintain them. My service is only a small payback to God in return for the blessings He has bestowed upon me."

Hearing from Ensign Roloff brings the war in Lebanon home to us in Haralson County. As I write this, I search for a conclusion. What should the response to this letter be? I could get "preachy" and tell you how we all need to be more appreciative of our freedoms and liberties that are often taken for granted. Or I could emphasize the fact that the boys need our prayers. Both conclusions are true.

We must remember that our world is bigger than Tallapoosa or Buchanan or Bremen or any of the little settlements like West View, Steadman or Corinth. What we do and say can influence peace or war in the world. What the District Line church did when the Roloffs moved to the county made a lasting impression on a young boy. Now that young man is defending freedom for all.

Ralph Waldo Emerson puts it this way:

So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
So near is God to man,
When Duty whispers low, "Thou must,"
The youth replies, "I can."●

NATIONAL HOSPICE MONTH

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a joint resolution designating the month of November 1984 as "National Hospice Month." I am pleased that 79 of my colleagues join me in introducing this resolution.

We have selected the month of November to commemorate hospice, an innovative, compassionate approach to caring for the terminally ill, because November 1984 marks the first anniversary of the Medicare hospice option. The implementation of hospice Medicare benefits has made it possible for hospice care to become a viable alternative to traditional acute care for many elderly Americans.

The hospice concept is centered on the belief that the dying are often better served in the familiar surrounding of their own homes or, if necessary, in a comfortable inpatient facility which allows them to spend their final days as peacefully and pain free as possible. The critical component of hospice care is the delivery of services by an interdisciplinary team of physicians, nurses, social workers, therapists, clergy, and specially trained volunteers. Approximately 1,200 programs, utilizing thousands of professionals and trained volunteers are dedicated to promoting the hospice concept.

Hospice care has proven to be an excellent way for patients and their families to help cope wih the immeasureable stress and emotion of terminal illness. While understanding and support for the hospice concept has grown dramatically in the last few years, there remains a need for public education regarding the benefits of hospice care. It is also important to recognize the significant contributions made by those involved in the provision of hospice services and in the advancement of the hospice movement.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the public education and recognition programs conducted during a National Hospice Month would expand the public's understanding of and support for hospice care as well as recognize the efforts and dedication of those involved in the provision of this humanitarian service.●

FREE INTERSTATE HIGHWAY FUNDS

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I urge you and other Members of the House leadership to give strong consideration to making sure that superfluous requests for interstate construction funds for nonrelated projects this year are dropped in order to assure passage of H.R. 5504.

The Director of the Office of Management and Budget has promised a veto of this legislation if requests for more than $6 billion are not dropped.

The bill includes more than $2.3 billion in legitimate interstate construction funds, and the States are anxious to receive their 1984 appropriations.

The State of Florida is waiting for its $90 million in order to complete planning and construction of the missing link of I-95 and I-75 in my congressional district, and to begin work on troublesome interstate highways like I-10.

I hope the Senate and the joint House-Senate conference committee will see the need to amend H.R. 5504, so that we can continue the uninterrupted construction of our interstate highways.●

BUDGET DEJA VU

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, there is a feeling of deja vu in this Chamber. As the old song goes, "It seems we've stood and talked like this before * * * but I don't remember where or when."

The only difference between the ballad's lyrics and the current situation on the budget is that all of us remember where and when we've been this year, and the year before and the year before that. Stuck.

But not as intractably so as we are now. For several days, both bodies of Congress have jockeyed back and forth on the debt ceiling issue. When it has come before the House for a vote, I have opposed it, and I will continue to oppose it until the other body shows a good faith effort toward resolving the enormous differences separating us on defense.

Although none of us wants to stay here in the late hours of the evening, maybe we should to demonstrate that the majority of House Members is sincere about a deficit downpayment. Maybe the other body would be better off in the long run to give a little now so the final product will be more to its liking later. Legislative chicken is a dangerous game but it appears now that it is the only game in town.●

RAISE THE DRINKING AGE

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, earlier this week the House of Representatives wisely voted to enact the Senate amendments to the Child Restraint Safety Act. These amendments are aimed at improving the antidrunk driving laws in this country.

I am particularly pleased with the passage of the amendment to withhold Federal highway funds from States which do not adopt 21 years as their minimum drinking age. This is an issue I have been working on for over a year, and one that is very important to me and my constituents. As a representative with a border between States with different minimum drinking ages, I am particularly sensitive to the need for a uniform drinking age throughout this country.

Earlier this week the Chicago Tribune published an editorial supporting the Congress' efforts to encourage the States to raise their minimum drinking ages to 21. I am inserting this editorial in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I urge my colleagues to read it.

RAISE THE DRINKING AGE

The U.S. House of Representatives has amended a highway bill with a measure intended to force all states to raise the legal drinking age to 21. The amendment would require 15 percent of a state's highway grants from Washington to be withheld if it refuses to comply with the proposed national standard by 1987.

The Senate should ratify the House action in the interest of highway safety. Teenagers and young adults are involved in a disproportionate number of traffic accidents to begin with, and allowing them to drive into roadside taverns and down a few "for the road" only increases the problem.

A national standard would put an end to the practice of teens in one state driving to a nearby state to take advantage of a lower drinking age, then weaving home.

The drinking age was lowered in many states, Illinois included, back in the Vietnam War era in an effort to bestow full citizenship on that segment of the population eligible to be drafted into the Army. Voting age requirements were lowered at the same time. It was reasoned that a person who was old enough to fight and die for his country was old enough to drink and vote. Unfortunately, the sentiment ignored biology. Many persons under 21 are quite simply not mature enough to handle liquor.

Illinois came to grips with the problem in 1980 when it raised its drinking age back to 21, and 22 other states have taken a similar approach. According to Jim Edgar, secretary of state, the number of traffic fatalities dropped 7 percent after the age was raised.

Unfortunately, the number of fatalities in the counties that border Wisconsin has increased 25 percent over the same span. Wisconsin, a state that is home to many breweries, allows drinking at age 18.

The interstate difficulties are one reason the uniform drinking age proposal has gained substantial support. The argument that the nation ought to have a uniform age of majority is outweighed by the evidence that shows there is a serious safety problem resulting from immature drunken drivers.●

A TRIBUTE TO LUCILLE SHEEHY

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, many fine Americans go unrecognized through life while contributing greatly to society in their own right, asking for thanks from no one. These unselfish individuals are the backbone of our country, and I would like to take a moment to recognize one shining example: Lucille Sheehy, a wonderful woman from New Jersey who has been helping others for over eight and one-half decades.

As a devoted wife and mother, Lucille focused her early energies on raising a family. Today, her son is the director of a company in Delaware, her daughter has her own advertising firm, and they have, combined, given Lucille 13 grandchildren and 6 great-grandchildren.

Never one to sit home, Lucille has been active in community service, especially since the passing of her husband in 1971. Her tireless energy and bubbling personality have been a constant source of motivation to the people around her.

Lucille's most notable community efforts include: Reading to children at school, helping at the local library, collecting clothes for the needy and books for nursing homes, and making bandages for cancer patients. When Lucille is asked to help, she never says no.

Politics have always been a passion of this partriotic lady who dubs herself a "constitutional conservative Republican." She has been active in Republican organizations in her community serving on the executive board and chairman of the program committee of the Ramsey Republican Club.

Lucille is a warm compassionate human being who has devoted her entire life to caring for others. I am proud to have the opportunity to say thank you to a fellow proud American.●

DEMOCRACY IN TURKEY

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, on May 15, Turkish martial law authorities blocked the publication of a petition signed by more than 1,200 Turkish intellectuals, including journalists, lawyers, academics, and artists. The petition is a statement of their concern about democracy and human rights in Turkey, and strongly supports a free press, a general amnesty, the autonomy of Turkish universities, and freedom of thought and association. The declaration also denounces torture and calls upon the Government of Turkey to take steps to eliminate torture and improve prison conditions.

According to the Turkish newspaper Cumhuriyet's report on June 7, 1984, over 500 of the people who signed the petition have been interrogated by the prosecutor's office of the Istanbul Martial Law Command.

Mr. Speaker, the Turkish citizens who signed the petition have shown courage and integrity in making their views known, particularly in view of continuing restrictions on freedom of speech in Turkey. Their support for democracy and human rights is an inspiration to their fellow citizens, and should be of special interest to the U.S. Congress. The text of the petition is included below, as is the New York Times article about the censorship of its publication in Turkey.

The following material was submitted for the RECORD:

[From the New York Times, May 16, 1984]

TURKEY BLOCKS PETITION SIGNED BY INTELLECTUALS

ANKARA, TURKEY, May 15.—The martial law authorities today blocked publication of a petition signed by 1,256 Turkish intellectuals denouncing press censorship and other features of military rule, newspaper editors said.

The petition, signed by leading academics, artists, lawyers, journalists, doctors and others, was given to the Government this morning, a spokesman for the signers said.

Hours later, newspaper and news agency editors said they had been told not to publish the document until the Government had responded to the charges in it. There was no sign when that would be.

The petition said torture of prisoners had become a common practice.

DECLARATION

PREAMBLE

Turkey continues to live through one of the most acute crises ever witnessed. There is no doubt that all sections, strata and officials comprising our social fabric share a burden of responsibility for this great crisis.

Awareness of this responsibility gives us the duty and the right to express our views on how we can make the transition to a healthier and safer social order.

We feel it necessary to publicise our views within the framework permitted by current legislation and Law 2969 so that what we have to say can in no way be construed as a legal offence.[1] Although we do not agree with the restrictions inherent in this legislation, we have no other option.

As private citizens, our only aim is to assume our democratic responsibilities. Our sole support is the legitimacy which we believe that the people of our country will undoubtedly confer upon our views.

Our initiative has been prompted by the social problems confronting our country. We want to make it clear that we have no links whatsoever with political circles, organisations or parties inside Turkey or abroad and that it would be erroneous to think otherwise.

We, the undersigned, fervently believe that good sense and reason will bring about the bright future which awaits our country. It is in this spirit and with these convictions that we have assumed our shared responsiblity, and using the right to petition derived from our Constitution, respectfully present our observations, thoughts and requests concerning the current situation in Turkey, to your exalted office.

DEMOCRACY AND HUMAN RIGHTS

A democracy is sustained by its institutions and general principles. It will be difficult to repair the damage done if the institutions, concepts and principles which constitute the mortar and foundations of democracy are destroyed. To alienate democracy from its inherent values and institutions, to preserve it in form while emptying it of its contents, is as dangerous as destroying it. This is why we intend to defend the institutions, concepts and principles which support a certain historically evolved structure of our state and to strengthen these within a democratic environment.

The Turkish people are entitled to the entire range of human rights available in contemporary societies, and should be in possession of these. We consider it humiliating that our country has been reduced to the position of a state whose human rights guarantees are subject of debates in other countries.

The fundamental aim of any organised social entity is the right to guarantee irrevocably and in a manner which can never be tampered with, the right of life and decent human existence.[2] This is a natural and sacred right. However, for this right to become meaningful, it is necessary to be able to express ideas openly, to be able to follow these through, and to be able to organise freely around them.

As opposed to ways of thinking which have recently become dominant, we believe that new and different ideas generated by individuals in our society are the source of social vitality and not, as alleged, the cause of periodic crises.

JUSTICE

Justice is the foremost guarantee of a humane existence as well as being the ultimate sanctuary of the individual. In a state founded on contemporary jurisprudence, the path to the realisation of justice must be clear of all obstacles, and therefore of exceptional courts and states of emergency. We believe that the maintenance of administrative practices and structures belonging to exceptional states of emergency even during normal times goes against the grain of democracy.

We believe that restrictions imposed upon individuals without due processes of the judiciary; one-sided administrative prosecutions which cannot be challenged[3]; the political rights of certain citizens and accusations levelled against them[4] cause grave fissures in our society. It is difficult to reconcile principles of a state based on modern jurisprudence when membership in associations, cooperatives, foundations, professional bodies, trade unions and political parties—and statements which were not regarded as a crime when first expressed—subsequently become indictable offenses because of changes in official attitudes and orthodoxy.

VIOLENCE

Democracy itself cannot be held to blame for the acute period of terror experienced in Turkey.

Every organised society has to defend itself against violence. However, one of the fundamental characteristics of statehood is adherence to legal norms in the struggle against terrorism. The existence of terror can never justify the state resorting to the same methods as the perpetrators of terror.

Torture, the existence of which has been proven by court decisions, is a crime against humanity. We are deeply concerned that torture has become a habitual form of primitive extra-judicial punishment for detainees prior to sentencing. Furthermore, we regard prison conditions which go beyond curtailing liberty as another form of torture.[5]

Necessary steps must be taken to eradicate torture. Equally, if the guarantees inherent in state jurisprudence and in the universal tenet that "individuals are presumed innocent until proved otherwise" are continued to be disregarded in administrative practices and court procedures, then arbitrariness and justice by fiat become the central norm particularly in political trials.

In view of the fact that all sections of our society carry some burden of responsibility for the escalation of terror,[6] we believe that the death penalty should be removed and that the execution of those already sentenced to death be commuted in an attempt to eradicate for good notions of resorting to violence as a means of solving our country's problems.

GENERAL AMNESTY

We hold the universally accepted truth that delayed justice is injustice; we therefore appeal for the speedy termination of all outstanding trials.

Crime is the result of specific social and political circumstances. We must not forget that all sections of our society bear responsibility for the upheavals of the recent past. This is why we think that a general amnesty will be an essential contribution towards social peace.

SOVEREIGNTY

Politics, which is the primary means of discerning good from bad and true from false in public life, requires the active participation of all. Certain inevitable shortcomings of our political past should not be used to establish a monopoly over political life by a group, one person or a privileged few, barring the way to what ought to be an open path to serve society by means of engaging in politics.

Politics can not be reduced to administrative decisions alone.

The will of the nation becomes meaningful only in systems where all sections of society can organize freely. Only in societies where no one fears persecution because of political views, philosophical beliefs and religious creed, can one justifiably claim the supremacy of the will of the nation. The legitimacy of national sovereignty is conditional upon attitudes towards fundamental rights and freedoms.

[1] Footnotes appear at end of article.

A situation which impedes the free determination of the will of the majority can not be regarded as being democratic. Equally, invoking the mandate of the majority to eradicate fundamental rights too can not be reconciled with democracy.

THE CONSTITUTION

Regarded from a historical perspective, democratic constitutions emerge as the culmination of processes directed towards protecting and guaranteeing individual rights and liberties.

Whatever the name given, any adjustments which result in the erosion of the rights of the individual vis a vis the state, imply a move away from democracy. When this is the case, the constitution, which ought to be the mainspring of democratic life, itself becomes a barrier to democracy.

The pillars of democratic life are comprised first and foremost by political parties and by trade unions, professional bodies and associations. Professional bodies and associations not only have the duty to unite and protect the economic interests of their members but also ought to be the means whereby individuals and groups can play an active part in protecting democratic liberties, and alongside political parties, influence and participate in decisionmaking processes. This is why we believe that the right to organise and the right to participate in the political process should be guaranteed by amendments to the constitution.

Freedom, diversity and innovation are essential ingredients of social life and are absolutely necessary for the future development of society, for maintaining avenues open for change and transformation. Therefore, all production of ideas ought to be protected and allowance made for new proposals to be presented freely.

FREE PRESS

A fundamental element of a democratic order is freedom of the press. For a free press to exist, it is essential that social communication and information be allowed to circulate in all diversity and independent of state control. It is also essential that the media be free to reflect different opinions and fully engage in criticism.

Thus, a free press is a prerequisite not only in forming a vibrant and diversified public opinion but also for the important function of the democratic supervision of the administration. Again, for these reasons we believe that as a precondition of ensuring its impartiality, the Turkish Television and Radio Corporation be granted autonomy from the state.[7]

EDUCATION

The main objective of education is to train free-thinking, learned, skilled and productive human beings. Attempts in the opposite direction to create uniform human beings goes against the grain of contemporary achievements and pluralist democracy. One aim of contemporary democracy is to nurture individuals imbued with a critical understanding of the world.

To maintain that the most sophisticated section of our society, namely the university circles, are not fit to run their own affairs and hence should be deprived of autonomy, is to deny that democracy can be made to work in Turkey. We are seriously concerned about the future of our country because all institutions of higher learning have been put under the administrative fiat of an appointed council, an administrative mechanism which has already dealt blows to academic standards and scientific research. This is why we propose that the higher education legislation [8] be immediately amended in favour of a system which will re-introduce university autonomy based on the principle of academic election.

ARTS AND CULTURE

We would like to stress the great importance of removing both legal and de facto limitations to the full flowering of the products of thought and art, and emphasise that the general protection extended to thinkers and cultural producers—as indeed to every individual—is a condition of civilised social life. A healthy social and cultural life requires the eradication of censorship which constricts all forms of cultural creativity, artistic production and the free dissemination of cultural products. No subject must be regarded as an official taboo, and whatever infringements there may arise ought to be dealt by due processes of law.[9]

CONCLUSION

In the light of the foregoing, we the undersigned who are fully conscious of our responsibilities towards our society, while not denying that contemporary democracy may indeed take different forms according to the specific conditions of disparate nations, nevertheless submit in all earnestness that democracy has an unchanging essence, that the institutions, concepts and principles which constitute this essence have also been adopted by the Turkish people, and that we can overcome the continuing crisis only if recent legislation and administrative practices which contradict this essence are removed by democratic means. This is how we can emerge out of the current crisis with strength and self-confidence.

[1] This is the law passed by the military which prohibits any criticism of "any decisions or measures whatsoever taken by the Council of National Security" which, it is claimed has "exercised legislative and executive power on behalf of the Turkish nation since 12th September 1980 to the formation of the Bureau of the Grand National Assembly of Turkey" in December 1983. This prohibition is also codified as a Provisional Article in the 1982 Constitution drafted by a Constituent Assembly selected by the five armed forces commanders comprising the Council of National Security.

[2] The 'right to life' is all but removed by the 1982 Constitution. Article 17 states that "occurrences of death as a result of a use of a weapon permitted by law as a necessary measure in cases of: apprehension, or the execution of warrants of arrest, the prevention of escape of lawfully arrested or convicted persons, the quelling of a riot or insurrection the execution of the orders of authorised bodies during martial law or state of emergency" are 'lawful killings'. This is none other than a carte blanche for summary executions of suspected dissidents.

[3] This refers to Martial Law Command decrees and prosecutions undertaken by military tribunals appointed by the Chief of Staff.

[4] This refers to a ban on former political leaders and executive committee members of parties closed down by the military.

[5] The daily newspaper Milliyet reports the following speech by Orhan Ergüder, Motherland Party MP for Istanbul: "Gentlemen, however hard we may try to be civilised, we can not feel relaxed until our prisons are modernized. Tomorrow prisons may turn out to be our domiciles as well . . . Our country's prisons have hosted some of our prime ministers and presidents. You never know what can happen. We want conditions in prisons to be much better". (May 29, 1984).

[6] This refers to the late 1970's which witnessed a carnage of political terror launched by the neo-fascist Nationalist Action Party and its paramilitary wing, the Grey Wolves.

[7] Under the new Constitution, the President of the Republic has effective control over state radio and television.

[8] Article 130 of the Constitution stipulates that university rectors will be appointed by the President. The Higher Education Council is an all-powerful non-elected body which controls and determines all aspects of university life from promotion of academics (now more or less regarded as civil servants) to acceptable forms of dress in lectures and university curricula. The Higher Education Council is composed of members appointed by the President from candidates nominated by the Chief of Staff (!) and the Council of Ministers and personal choices of the President.

[9] Article 28 of the Constitution stipulates that "when delay is deemed prejudicial" "competent authorities designated by law" can confiscate publications, i.e. martial law authorities and the police. If a publication is banned, the printing presses can also be confiscated.●

SUMMITRY AND NATIONAL SECURITY: IS IT IN OUR BEST INTEREST?

HON. NEWT GINGRICH

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, there have been numerous calls by the Democratic Presidential candidates for President Reagan to arrange a summit meeting with Soviet leaders. These have been pro forma, considering the extreme leftward tilt of the Democratic Party.

More recently, some members of President Reagan's own party are urging him to meet with the Soviet leader. While summits can be useful under the proper conditions, many people ignore the basic problems that summits can produce for a free and open society such as our own. Mr. Burton Pines, vice president of the Heritage Foundation, has written an excellent memorandum which discusses the pitfalls of summitry and the negative effects it can have upon the United States. I'm inserting it for my colleagues so that members of both parties can see where their calls for a summit can lead us. The text of the memorandum follows:

SUPERPOWER SUMMITRY AND ITS PERILS

The desire to see Ronald Reagan sit down for a chat with Soviet leader Konstantin Chernenko is one of the most admirable American impulses. It reflects a folksy faith that policy can be affected by personality and that U.S.-Soviet tensions are in part a misunderstanding which can be dissolved if the two superpower chieftains powwow and convince each other of their desire for peace. Americans felt reassured, for example, when Franklin Roosevelt warmly spoke of "Uncle Joe" Stalin. And Americans sighed in satisfaction when Nikita Khrushchev in 1959 visited Disneyland and waded through the mud of an Iowa farm.

It is no wonder that U.S. presidents feel almost constant pressure to head towards the summit. Ronald Reagan, however, should not be stampeded up the summit trail. History teaches not only that summits are no sure thing for improving relations, but that they can increase tensions and almost always serve Soviet interests much more than American.

There have been thirteen U.S.-Soviet summits, starting with the 1943 meeting in Teheran of Roosevelt and Britain's Winston Churchill with the Soviet Union's Josef Stalin. Subsequent summits convened:

February 1945, at Yalta, with Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin;

July 1945, at Potsdam, with Harry Truman, Britain's leaders and Stalin;

July 1955, at Geneva, with Dwight Eisenhower, British and French leaders and Soviet Premier Nikolai Bulganin;

September 1959, at Washington, with Eisenhower and Khrushchev;

May 1960, at Paris, with Eisenhower, British and French leaders and Khrushchev;

June 1961, at Vienna, with John Kennedy and Khrushchev;

June 1967, at Glassboro (New Jersey), with Lyndon Johnson and Soviet Premier Alexei Kosygin;

May 1972, at Moscow, with Richard Nixon and Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev;

June 1973, at Washington, with Nixon and Brezhnev;

June 1974, at Moscow, with Nixon and Brezhnev;

November 1974, at Vladivostok, with Gerald Ford and Brezhnev;

June 1979, at Vienna, with James Carter and Brezhnev.

The results of these meetings were spotty. The most successful was Geneva. It was carefully planned to produce an agreement for the occupying powers to withdraw from Austria. The resulting "Spirit of Geneva" became the Cold War's first thaw. Much less successful were Johnson's meeting with Kosygin, Nixon's 1974 trip to Moscow and the Vladivostok gathering; little was accomplished. Some summits have been disasters. At Yalta, Roosevelt made concessions for which 109 million East Europeans are still paying, while Khrushchev's bullying of Kennedy at Vienna surely emboldened the Soviet leader to erect the Berlin Wall a few months later and to station offensive nuclear missiles in Cuba the following year.

That summitry is perilous has been widely appreciated. Dean Acheson, Truman's Secretary of State, wrote of his "deep dislike and distrust of the 'summit conference.'" He warned that summits "too often [have] been a gamble, the experience nerve-racking and the results unsatisfactory." Kennedy's Secretary of State, Dean Rusk, wrote that "such experience as we have had with summit diplomacy does not encourage the view that it contributes to the advancement of American interests." And Henry Kissinger's memoirs caution that "summit meetings are risky business."

FOUR DECADES OF SUMMITRY TEACH IMPORTANT LESSONS

(1) Summits asymmetrically affect the U.S. and the USSR. In the wide open American society, extensive media coverage of an approaching summit raises public expectations to towering heights which can plunge to painful disillusion if the expectations are not fulfilled. At the summit, American press coverage places the president in a fishbowl. By contrast, Kremlin control of Soviet media gives it rheostat-like manipulation of Soviet public expectations and knowledge of the summit.

(2) American leaders are tempted irresistably to exploit a summit for domestic political purposes. This prompts them to exaggerate the summit's importance. Soviet leaders have no need to do so.

(3) Having raised public expectations, American presidents dare not return from a summit emptyhanded. As a summit's conclusion approaches and success remains beyond reach, a president may be tempted to make reckless concessions. At Moscow in 1972, for example, Nixon was so determined to return home with a SALT I treaty that he negotiated hastily and sloppily, creating the loopholes which Moscow has been exploiting ever since. Writes Kissinger, "Any meeting with the Soviets at the Presidential or Secretary of State level that did not lead to a breakthrough was dismissed by the media as a failure." Soviet leaders, meanwhile, pay no penalty for leaving a summit emptyhanded; no Kremlin boss has ever got into trouble for negotiating too toughly with the U.S.

(4) Simply going to the summit fosters a mood in the U.S. which makes national security concerns seem less urgent, even though the summit does not slow Soviet military programs.

These lessons cannot be ignored by those who call for a U.S.-Soviet summit. The President is right to be cautious. He is right to insist on careful planning, a detailed agenda and final drafts of those agreements which he will be expected to sign. Only then, history teaches us, should he consent to ascend the summit.●

JAMES H. ROWE, JR.

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, with the passing last week of James H. Rowe, Jr., I said farewell to a dear and devoted friend, as did the Nation, to a dedicated and invaluable servant. I met Jim Rowe in the late thirties when I was a young U.S. Senator, and I worked closely with him at the Roosevelt White House. Those were great times and many, many giants passed across the stage of those years, making an indelible mark toward the betterment of our country. We rose to heights which we have seldom reached. I shall always hunger for the spirit of those times and for those great and good people who led and made them. Jim Rowe was one of those outstanding statesmen and I—and I know all who knew him—shall cherish his memory forever.

Mr. Speaker, I include with my remarks the magnificent, comprehensive, illuminating, and stirring eulogy by Jim's admiring and devoted son, James H. Rowe III, along with certain newspaper articles of tribute to this great American, to serve as a permanent record from which generations to come can savour these memories.

Good morning. On behalf of the Rowe family, I want to thank you all for joining us to pay tribute to my father, James H. Rowe, Jr.

Before I begin, I have a personal message for my wife and my sisters. They have all told me that I must be short. Well the other lady in my life has overruled you. Mom has asked her favorite son to take his time. So put your stopwatches away and relax.

Dad loved this cathedral. Although he was not a particularly religious person, he felt a strong attachment here, for it was on these grounds that all of his children were educated and his daughter Betsy was married downstairs in Bethlehem Chapel. After suffering a major heart attack in 1962, dad would circle the cathedral and Cleveland Park as he successfully regained his health. This regimen of walking in solitary splendor represented his own personal thanksgiving.

Dad's home is down the street from here on a sleepy alley named Highland Place. The Rowes have lived there for a third of a century in that rambling, whiteframe house. It has been and will remain our vantage ground.

I remember coming home from school one day in tears. "Mom", I cried, "politics stinks!" "Why?" she said. I explained that a favorite classmate would soon be leaving town because his father, a Congressman, had just been defeated. "That happens" she replied as she tried to console her 10-year old son with the prospect of summer rendezvous. "I'm glad that dad has never run for office and I hope he never will" I exclaimed. Mom responded, "wouldn't you even like the idea of daddy being the President and living in the White House?" "No", said I, "it's in the wrong neighborhood."

Our open door policy at home has been a magnetic force in this city. Individuals of all ages and backgrounds have camped there. Discussing and debating. Playing cards and playing charades. Hunting Easter eggs and hitting home runs. Campaigning and counseling. Celebrating and crying. The Bundys, the Whites, the Gesells. Mom and Dad reigned but everyone was treated fairly. In talking about President Roosevelt's greatness, Dad would always point to F.D.R.'s way with people. He said that "the boss" created a bilateral relationship with anyone he saw more than once. This was the rule at Highland Place.

This too has been a historical house:

The Kennedy administration trying to hush up Alfred, "Uncle Al," Friendly's scoop of the Cuban missile crisis during my parent's 25th wedding anniversary party;

President Johnson captivating us on Christmas day 1968 and confirming once again Dad's description of him being the most brilliant of Presidents that he had known;

Vice Presidential candidates-to-be Humphrey and Muskie being quietly examined in an empty House after Dad so thoughtfully exiled us to Cape Cod;

Senator Mansfield, his earliest friend and Dad's most dedicated contemporary, weighing the position of majority leader with his fellow Montanan;

And Grace Tully, that most gallant of ladies, telling for the last time her memories of that fateful day in Warm Springs when she kissed F.D.R. goodbye.

I leave to historians Dad's New Deal accomplishments and his political significance.

Dad was first and foremost a Montanan, a true man of the West. Independent. Skeptical. Proud. Irish. These were the characteristics of his parents, James and Josephine, and his sister Helen. His birthplace, Butte, Montana would flourish during his adolescence. Its population would exceed 100,000 by 1920 with 20,000 miners digging on what was called the Richest Hill on Earth. After excelling in high school, his father sent him to a Jesuit preparatory school for seasoning. Worried that the priesthood might not be his son's best vocation, senior Rowe sent the younger East for college.

Dad arrived in Cambridge in 1927. Years later dad would thrust his 50th class reunion report in my face and tell me to turn to a certain page. "Oh no, said I, "Harvarditis has set in again!" "No, no," he said, with more that the customary twinkle in his eye. I was perplexed for I saw that he had marked not his own entry but the closing sentence of one of his classmate's entries which read—

"[T]he only classmate I've seen is Jim Rowe, whom some of us in Mckinlock hall in the freshman year of 1927-1928 came to know as that wild-eyed cowboy from Montana."

Dad did encounter some initial academic setbacks. His father quickly sent off a letter to the freshman dean stating "My son is fairly big and he'd probably make a good truck driver. Do you think he'd be a better truck driver. Tell me and I'll take him out of there." This needling encouragement from afar contributed to his seven glorious years at the college and then the law school.

Dad's career was the law. He served as Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes last secretary. Justice Holmes had fought in the Civil War and talked to another soldier who had fought in the Revolutionary War. Imagine—our country's entire history has been witnessed by these three men. Dad and his beloved colleague Thomas "Tommy the Cork" Corcoran were with the Justice at his death. Later these two comrades would team together again in private practice.

Dad called his administrative practice "boring" and perhaps that is understandable for one who had drafted, executed, and administered the laws of the New Deal. But for me, a trip downtown to 15th and K was a rare treat. Dad would practice law there for 37 years, in the same cubbyhole of an office. The hallways seeped with history but were utterly without pretension. Today a young associate would turn his nose up at such digs. But even, as a small boy, I knew that no other firm around had the infectious charm and brilliance of these special practitioners. Lady Bird Johnson, the best of first ladies and the finest of friends, visited our family twice during these last few days. She would call Corcoran, Youngman and Rowe "A firm of stars blessed with singular men."

Dad's love for the people in the companies he represented gave him his joy. In return he received unwavering loyalty from his clients. They too loved him as much as we do. He never retired.

Our childhood days at home were hardly tranquil. In his 25th Class Reunion Report dad would describe us "as three entirely too young children, who alternately delight us and drive us to the outer edges of irritation and despair." Dad was no bargain either. At times he could be, as we all know, more than a little difficult. Although he may have first developed his distinctive bark during his "bird dog" days of the new deal, he certainly honed his tongue on his offspring. The daily inquisitions at the dining room table were only made bearable by Rennie's and Ollie's cooking and mom's grace. Our school lessons paled in comparison to his masterly probing. He was silenced only by our asking him "parlez-vous francais?" French was truly pa's greatest failing.

His older daughter, Betsy, however, soon stunned her father with her academic achievements. She too has already enjoyed a distinguished legal career. Like her mother she would marry a handsome and rugged westerner who came east for schooling and high governmental service. Together, Betsy and Doug Costle, would produce two grandchildren, Caroline and Douglas. Each brought dad much joy. "I have lived too long" he would say. "Imagine, my granddaughter has been named a Ronald Reagan Academic Scholar." Her decision, however, to go to Harvard next fall more than made up for it. "Douglas" he would boast to his classmates is a "superjock, the first in our clan."

His other daughter, Clarissa, whom I only half jokingly call "the favorite" child, would inherit dad's lighthearted and lefthanded ways. From mom, she got her true eye for beauty and her passionate concern for the great outdoors. She married Stephen, an educator, soon to be businessman, and they brought Jessica Batzell into our lives. This delightful two-year old brightened dad's last years with her Shirley Temple curls and joyous personality. We pray, however, that Jessica possesses her mother's leftist leanings and not Shirley's political views.

I too would share dad's fondness for law, government and, most importantly, people. I too have benefited greatly from the needling and loving encouragement of a proud father. Not surprisingly, I married a beautiful, independent and demanding woman. On my wedding day, dad would whisper, "You too have married above yourself." Lisa's Yale education and banking background brought her much amiable ribbing from dad. She quickly atoned, however, by providing him with chocolates and by moving to Washington.

His Godson Bardyl would resemble his second father with his thoughtful generosity, striking demeanor and zestful personality.

Dad's greatest accomplishment, bar none, was his marriage to mom. Adjectives can not begin to describe this magnificient lady. She first met dad almost 50 years ago at a party on Connecticut Avenue. As she recalled that meeting again last week, she said that they stayed up talking for hours. "At that time," mom would chuckle, "only Republicans could afford to throw parties. We were surrounded by them that night and it was as if your father and I spoke Greek to one another." Her sister Jean gave us a few more details this week. Jean Friendly, the younger half of the glamorous Ulman girls, "it was scandalous. Jim and Libby sat on a bathtub and talked until dawn." Mom and dad continued to talk in their own special language for 46 years of married life.

Mom's career is also well known in this city. As a journalist, labor leader and urban planner, she too made history. In keeping with his liberal views, dad encouraged mom's work and was always her biggest supporter. She would turn down her fondest of friends, President Johnson, when he asked her to run the city of Washington. For at the same time, she oversaw what she so aptly called "the buttoning and unbuttoning" of dad's life. Which by itself, was a full-time job.

Dad's handling of the practicalities of life never changed over the years. His old roommate, Judge Reilly, would pack the groom's belongings for my parents' trip to Montana to show off the bride. Thinking that the porter would expect a young man on the way up to have at least two bags, Uncle Gerry purchased a second suitcase and lovingly filled it with his old tennis balls. In return, dad told Reilly that it was time for him to leave his bachelor digs in order to keep an eye on dad's new marriage quarters. Reilly arrived on the doorstep for a needed rest and unlocked the door. The house was bare—father's only acquisition had been the extra key.

Mom and dad were true companions but physical proximity was not a necessary ingredient in this magnificient union. On dad's 70th birthday, mom would look on contentedly from afar as dad was surrounded at the head table by a representative sampling from his legion of younger female admirers.

During these last years of the Carter and Reagan administrations, dad would grumble that he had been relegated to the role of "accompanying spouse." This was particularly true when mom's position on the White House Historical Association would enable him to return to his old domain. Fortunately in the recent years mom and dad took the time "to smell the roses along the way," especially as they circled the globe together. Few men have ever traveled in such style.

As their children, we loved nothing more than their storytelling. The stories of their past experiences gave us many lessons for the future but our parents shared instead an intense curiosity about the here and now. As Dad lay dying those last few days, he pointed to the Post and the Journal for the news of today and not at older tomes or clippings. This newspaper fetish would be remembered by all but most particularly by his children's spouses. They would wonder whether this idiosyncrasy arose from Pa's surprising shyness or from his everlasting affection for news.

It is fitting that Dad will be laid to rest at Arlington National. He rarely spoke about his war experiences and never mentioned his medals. At age 36, he left his second-ranking post at the Justice Department, his wife and young child for the Pacific Theatre operations. Once again he experienced history first hand. One of his aircraft carriers, the U.S.S. Sewanee, was the first ship to be hit by kamikazes, some 40 years ago during the battle of Leyte Gulf. His gun crew was decimated but Dad survived to lead the fire-fighting that saved many lives and salvaged the ship. He would go on to receive two presidential citations for bravery, eight battle stars and a naval commendation ribbon.

This remarkable valor would reappear later in life. First, as he survived a 6-week stay on the critical list after his heart attack and later, with his lengthy battle with congestive heart failure. He never ever complained about his physical ailments. After outliving by two weeks his doctors' and family's expectations, he drifted off in peace, surrounded, as he knew, by his family in the home he loved so much.

The only maxims he handed down to his children were the ones he said he had received from his father. First, never get in a fight with a policeman. Second, never bet against the Yankees.

Well, I learned from and listened to this marvelous man over the years. The lessons for my future children are these:

First, institutions change over time and the Yankees are no exception;

Second, do not let your ambition cloud your judgement;

Third, never retire;

Fourth, and most important of all, family and friends mean much more than power and praise.

Dad, to paraphrase your old mentor, Justice Holmes, "you touched our hearts with fire." You also touched our minds. You exemplified life as Justice Holmes defined it in another speech. He said:

"I think that, as life is action and passion, it is required of a man that he should share the passion and action of his time at peril of being judged not to have lived."

My, how you have lived. Goodby you wild-eyed cowboy. We love you. We shall miss you. Today we salute you. Tomorrow we shall begin to glory in your memory.

JAMES H. ROWE III.

JAMES HENRY ROWE, JR.

"I was 28 when I first went in the White House," James H. Rowe Jr. recalled in an interview last year about his life and times in Democratic politics since the New Deal. "Roosevelt said, 'Your job is to be a bird dog.' I said, 'What does that mean?' 'Just run around town and find out what's happening.' So that's what I did. . . . Pretty good job." And quite an understatement, as any veteran of the Washington political scene knows. Mr. Rowe, who died Sunday at the age of 75, did "run around town" for more than 40 years, from the back rooms of party power to those centers of the capital city where legislative ideas were brewing in the charged atmosphere of the New Deal.

Political Washington was quite different then, Mr. Rowe would note, describing the tight White House circle in which FDR's trusted assistants with "a passion for anonymity" worked long and furiously on legislation, rules, regulations—and the votes to put them on the books, which was one of the missions Mr. Rowe executed with polish and results. "There were three secretaries and, I think, one assistant secretary. . . . While we were building the arsenal for democracy and getting ready for the war, it started expanding. It's never stopped since."

Together with his colleague in the White House then and in law practice later, the late Thomas G. Corcoran, Mr. Rowe relied on a combination of personal contacts, charm and exchanges of valuable information to brief presidents and to road-test presidential ideas. To Democrats, he would become, and remain until his death, a respected "professional politician" whose commitment to his party's progressive interest and its long-term strength did not yield to the passing fancies of any wing. Mr. Rowe was a man marked by humor, loyalty and great generosity—and one who affected a certain curmudgeonly, almost playful crankiness, lest anyone say what a nice guy he really was.

He once noted of young congressman Lyndon Johnson, "He had tremendous energy, swept around, knew everybody." This, of course, was precisely what Mr. Johnson and countless other colleagues, friends and admirers of Jim Rowe cherished over the years—and one of the things those who survive him will remember and greatly miss.

[From the Washington Post, June 19, 1984]

JAMES H. ROWE, LAWYER, AIDE TO FDR, DIES AT 75

(By J.Y. Smith)

James H. Rowe Jr., 75, who served in the White House under President Franklin D. Roosevelt and went on to play an influential but largely unheralded role in the political and governmental life of the capital for more than 40 years, died of a heart ailment June 17 at his home in Washington.

Mr. Rowe, a Harvard-trained attorney from Butte, Mont., came to Washington in 1934 as the New Deal was taking form. He contributed to the political, social and economic programs that gave it meaning and in the process sharpened his own perceptions of the people, events and power play in Washington. Thus his counsel was sought by occupants of the White House even though his formal government service lasted little more than a decade. By reason of his judgment, his influence was greater than the positions he held.

In addition, Mr. Rowe, to one degree or another, knew or worked for all of Roosevelt's successors. His own opinion was that Roosevelt was the greatest and Lyndon B. Johnson the brightest.

Mr. Rowe started as an attorney with the National Emergency Council. Soon after, he became the secretary to Associate Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., as great an honor as any that could befall a young lawyer at that time. A previous occupant of that position was Thomas G. Corcoran, an innovator and power in New Deal circles and a man with whom Mr. Rowe was to be associated until Mr. Corcoran's death in 1981.

After a year with Holmes, Mr. Rowe worked for the Reconstruction Finance Corp. Later he was on the staffs of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Public Works Administration, where he dealt with matters involving public utilities. Colleagues he met along the way, in addition to Corcoran, included Ben Cohen, an intellectual who shared FDR's vision of government for people, not interests; William O. Douglas, a member of the SEC and later an associate justice of the Supreme Court; Abe Fortas, a brilliant student of Douglas at Yale Law School whom Lyndon Johnson sent to the Supreme Court many years later; Rexford Guy Tugwell, a power in planning and agriculture; Raymond Moley, who later made a mark in journalism, and many others.

The issues were plain. In an interview with The Washington Post in 1983, Mr. Rowe recalled that "Rex Tugwell used the phrase that got him into trouble saying "We will roll up our sleeves and make America over." The press raised hell about it, and business. We privately thought that was just what we were doing, and it was clear that there was a black-and-white situation.

"The businessmen and bankers were bastards and we knew it, and something had to be done. And they thought we were bastards. We worked all the time on legislation or rules and regulations."

One of the important bills Mr. Rowe worked on was the Public Utilities Holding Company Act of 1935. He helped Corcoran and Cohen draft it. The sponsor of the bill in the House was Sam Rayburn of Texas, the speaker and a close friend of Mr. Rowe. The issue of public power was a rallying point for many of the warriors, young or old, of the New Deal.

The issue also was of prime importance to Lyndon Johnson, who won a special election to Congress in 1937. His job was to ensure the construction of the Marshall Ford Dam on the Colorado River and to provide electric power to the farmers and ranchers of the Texas hill country. He sought help from Corcoran, Fortas, Mr. Rowe and others.

By this time, Mr. Rowe had gone to the White House. Through Corcoran, he had garnered a job as a speech writer for James Roosevelt. This brought him to the attention of the president, who hired him as an assistant with an order to keep his eyes and ears open. In time, Mr. Rowe took charge of FDR's appointments.

It was because he could invoke the name of the White House that he was able to help Johnson not only with the dam, but with Johnson's work as chairman of the House Democratic congressional campaign committee. LBJ took over this work for the 1940 election. He dispensed money to Democratic candidates and saw that they got other favors, such as public works projects for their districts. On orders from FDR, Rowe used his access to cabinet departments and other agencies to see that these projects were forthcoming.

In "The Years of Lyndon Johnson: The Path to Power," a brilliant biography published in 1982, Robert Caro gives a memorable picture of Mr. Rowe and Johnson awaiting returns on election night in 1940 and then sharing the good news with Roosevelt on the telephone from Hyde Park.

Mr. Rowe always described Roosevelt as a man of enormous charm. A favorite anecdote concerned a time that Mr. Rowe, then 29, advised the president to handle a personnel problem a certain way. The president said he would do as suggested, but do it in his own way. When Mr. Rowe persisted, the president replied, "I do not have to do it your way and I will tell you the reason why. The reason is that, although they may have made a mistake, the people of the United States elected me president, not you."

In 1941, after three years at the White House, Mr. Rowe went to the Justice Department as an assistant attorney general. During the latter part of World War II, he served in the Navy. In 1945 and 1946, he was an official of the Nuremberg war crimes tribunals.

He then returned here and went into a private law practice with Corcoran. He never retired.

Throughout his years in private life, Mr. Rowe remained a man known to the world of power and influence. His experience commanded respect and his views carried weight. In 1967, he headed a committee for the reelection of Johnson. When Johnson announced that he would devote full time to searching for peace in Vietnam and that under no circumstances would he seek reelection, Mr. Rowe gave his help to Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey, the eventual Democratic nominee.

But by his own account there never was a time in his life quite like the years of the New Deal.

"When Tommy Corcoran died I did his eulogy in the church," Mr. Rowe told this newspaper in 1983. "I said something about, 'With the possible exception of the Founding Fathers there's never been [such] a period.' And I'm not so damned sure about the Founding Fathers, but I didn't say so. They were pretty good, I admit."

Mr. Rowe's survivors include his wife, the former Elizabeth Holmes Ulman, whom he married in 1937, of Washington; three children, Elizabeth Rowe Costle of Falls Church, Clarissa Rowe of Arlington, Mass., and James H. Rowe III of Washington, and three grandchildren.●

DANGERS OF A CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, for the first time since adopting the Constitution in 1787, America faces the possibility of holding a Constitutional Convention. Although a Constitutional Convention would enable Congress to address important issues of our time, the convention could not, under the Constitution, be held exclusively to consider an amendment to deal with Federal budget deficits.

In a recent Chicago Tribune article, Samuel Witwer cited several potential pitfalls of a Constitutional Convention. Due to the wording of article V, which encompasses changes initiated by Congress, there is no positive assurance that a convention could be limited to a particular issue once the convention convened. Under article V, all laws and amendments are subject to change. Thus, constitutional upheaval at all levels could result if Congress were forced to call the proposed convention. Also, other countries may view a Constitutional Convention as a disintegration of our American political institutions and a lack of high purpose, resolve, and a capacity to lead. Furthermore, the existing Constitution is a document of principle, inspiration, equity, and an opportunity for all people.

In 3 years our Nation will celebrate the 200th anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution. Hopefully, this event will not be marred by an imprudently called convention with uncertain constraints. I commend the following article to the attention of my colleagues:

RISKING A CONSTITUTIONAL CRISIS

(By Samuel W. Witwer)

No citizen can be complacent about huge federal budget deficits, now estimated in the range of $200 billion, and reasonable steps certainly are in order to work toward balanced budgets. However, the method chosen by advocates of reform—the call for a federal constitutional convention—is dangerous to an extreme. It could be even more damaging to our national interests than budgetary imbalances.

America faces the possibility of holding a constitutional convention for the first time since 1787, when the U.S. Constitution was adopted. Such a startling development could result from the balanced-budget proponents' quiet, persistent campaign to obtain state petitions calling on Congress to "call" such a convention.

The proponents of reform, reacting to Congress' failure to submit to the states for ratification an amendment mandating a balanced budget, have chosen a "shotgun" approach instead of seeking to elect a Congress that would pass such an amendment. They are demanding a constitutional convention to achieve their budgetary objective, and therein lies the potential for a grave constitutional crisis of unprecedented dimensions.

Their legislative campaign has netted 32 state petitions of one sort or another, just two short of the magic number of 34 states required by the Constitution [Article V] to force Congress to call the proposed convention.

The degree of care given by many of the states in passing their critical convention-call resolutions may well be questioned. But aside from that factor, there are many additional reasons why a constitutional convention calling for a balanced budget amendment or, for that matter, any other "single issue," would be a grave error.

For one thing, there is general satisfaction with the existing Constitution as a document that has served our nation well. It is a document of principle, inspiration, equity and opportunity for all people. As needs for change became manifest, one of the two amendment methods provided in Article V—changes initiated by Congress—has proven responsive and effective on 26 occasions. So it is understandable that many citizens and legal scholars who hold the Constitution in high regard are becoming worried about the dangers of a second constitutional convention and the uncharted course upon which this nation would embark if such a convention were called for the ostensible purpose of mandating a balanced budget.

Moreover, leading proponents of the convention call have announced that such a convention, once assembled, would consider a variety of related issues such as provision for vetoes of parts of bills [the so-called "line-item" veto], for national referenda on budgetary questions, for return to the gold standard and presumably matters that would affect "fiscal aspects" of our domestic and foreign policy concerns.

Though the history of the 1787 convention and the wording of Article V suggest that a convention could either be limited or general in scope, legal scholars agree there can be no positive assurance that a convention could be limited to a particular amendment once the convention had convened. Thus, there is no assurance that all facets of American law, government and the civil rights of U.S. citizens could not be opened to debate and possible revision by a runaway convention.

The situation is unlike state constitutional conventions, more than 200 of which have been held. In the states, there is a literature of constitutional reform, numerous precedents, enabling acts and other traditions that throw a cloak of procedural certainty and order around the call of state constitutional conventions, most of which have been general and unlimited.

Although the question of whether a federal constitutional convention may be confined to a single subject is the major concern, other questions of great constitutional importance remain unanswered as well:

What constitutes a valid application which Congress must count? Who is to judge its validity? What is the length of time applications will be counted to determine if 34 are filed? What will be the procedures for selection of delegates? Would this be left to appointment by state legislatures or the one-man one-vote electoral process? May a state legislature withdraw an application for a convention once submitted or rescinded a previous ratification? Would issues arising in a convention be reviewable by the courts?

Prof. Lawrence H. Tribe of the Harvard Law School sees the primary threat imposed by an Article V convention as that of "a confrontation between Congress and such a convention," noting also that the dispute would inevitably draw into the confrontation the Supreme Court itself. The outcome could be constitutional upheaval at all levels. Thus, I cannot agree with James Davidson, chairman of the National Taxpayer's Union, the foremost group campaigning for a budget-balancing convention. He would justify that risky venture as a "fantastic national civics lesson, more exciting than 'Brideshead Revisited.'"

Considering the magnitude of our domestic problems, this is not the time to organize a "national civics lesson," which could be of unlimited scope once launched. Considering the instability, confusion and dangers abroad, the holding of a constitutional convention could be interpreted in other countries as a disintegration of our American institutions and a lack of high purpose, resolve and capacity to lead.

In three years our nation will celebrate the 200th anniversary of the adoption of its Constitution. Let us hope that meanwhile that historic event will not be marred by an imprudently called convention of unknowable authority and uncertain constraints.●

THE INCOME JOBS ACTION ACT OF 1984

HON. CHARLES A. HAYES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, as we prepare to return to our districts for the Independence Day district work period, some of our colleagues may recall a recent press conference held by the President in which he continued to trumpet the number of new jobs created in America during the past 18 months. Indeed this is good news and hopefully it will continue. However, the President ignores the fact that over 8.8 million American workers are still out of work and cannot find work. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, many of our colleagues already know the reality of the situation. They know the dismal existence their unemployed constituents lead, and they know that something must be done to change that situation.

In response to the crisis of unemployment in our society and the need for new and innovative strategies to attack this critical problem, I have introduced along with my colleague, Representative JOHN CONYERS, H.R. 5814, The Income Jobs Action Act of 1984. It is our intent that passage of this bill will provide the kind of security and purchasing power necessary to lead to a true and lasting economic recovery for all Americans. In the near future I will be contacting my colleagues to request their support for H.R. 5814. In that regard, I call their attention to the following article by noted journalist Vernon Jarrett, that speaks on the merits of the bill.

The article follows:

[From the Chicago Sun-Times, June 15, 1984]

FDR SPIRIT LIVES IN JOBS BILL

(By Vernon Jarrett)

The soul of Franklin D. Roosevelt disappeared from the White House eons ago, it seems, but you can't say his spirit is absent from the House of Representatives.

Yesterday, Representatives Charles Hayes (D.-Ill.) and John Conyers Jr. (D.-Mich.) introduced the Income Jobs Action Act of 1984, which embodies the essence of the late New Deal president's "Economic Bill of Rights."

The Hayes-Conyers bill would commit the United States to the proposition that "every adult American able and willing to work" has a right to earn a living, and "Americans unable to work for pay" have a right to an adequate standard of living.

Americans should not be misled by the "slight improvement" in the current jobless figures announced by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, cautioned Hayes, a former labor official from Chicago, when he introduced the bill. Hayes reminded some of his more gullible fellow citizens that there are 8.8 million people unemployed and that the bureau's figures fail to include the thousands of men, women and youths who have exhausted their employment benefits and have become "so discouraged that they have discontinued their search for jobs."

This bill presents a sixpoint plan while calling for a moral commitment from the government and the private sector.

In this bill, there is one critical commitment needed today under President Reagan (one that almost expired under President Carter). It is the prohibition of the Federal Reserve Board and other regular or independent agencies from ever again using recession, stagnation or involuntary unemployment to reduce wages, salaries and inflation.

One of the more specific sections has to do with the establishment of a "conversion planning office" that will promote conversion of economic production from "military to civilian sectors" that are declining, but have a "greater potential for offering useful and productive employment."

How would such a program be financed?

One percent of any funds awarded to the secretary of defense for each fiscal year beginning after Sept. 30, 1984, would be deposited into the conversion planning fund.

Other than its commitment of the government to a restatement of noble goals, the heart of the bill is government planning, which is an ugly word to old-line conservatives and neo-conservatives. Here's what the Hayes-Conyers bill would have all levels of government do, with consistency and a sense of priority:

Within six months after the date of enactment, the president in his annual economic report and budget message would be required to transmit to Congress a "staged program" to implement the ideals and goals expressed in the bill.

What about the probability of a concentration of federal or corporate power?

Such would be "counterbalanced" by the involvement of village, city, county and state governments and urban, suburban and agricultural areas throughout the country. The list also would include small and large businesses, labor organizations, non-profit, voluntary and cooperative organizations and women's groups, as well as organizations of racial and ethnic minorities.

For the cynical who seek nothing more than the romantic jargon of the crusader, there's plenty of material. The bill calls for a 35-hour workweek "without any corresponding loss of weekly wages," and there is that familiar refrain calling for "reductions in the military budget."

But what the cynical often forget is that yesterday's romantic jargon is today's urgency. The Hayes-Conyers bill is today an urgent plea.●

REAGAN AND THE YOUNG TURKS: TOWARD A CONSERVATIVE OPPORTUNITY SOCIETY

HON. NEWT GINGRICH

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, there is an obvious need for new ideas on the future of our country. It's the Republican Party which must encourage new ideas and present them to the people as an alternative to the liberal welfare state failures offered by the Democrats. The early success of GARY HART's bid for the Democratic nomination showed that the American people are tired of big Government spending and wasting more and more of their money. They wanted changes. GARY HART, however, failed to systematically and coherently present any new ideas.

Ralph Hallow has written an excellent article in the Washington Times which I would like to present to my colleagues. It outlines where Ronald Reagan, if he so chooses, can lead his party and country in the rest of this decade. The article provides some good common sense and advice for the President and the Republican Party. The article follows:

[From the Washington Times, June 26, 1984]

GOP's POPULIST CONCERNS

(By Ralph Z. Hallow)

President Kennedy had it. President Reagan has it. It's endearing, this ability to laugh at one's self occasionally. To some high school students the other day, Mr. Reagan quoted Thomas Jefferson on the evils of big government: "I am not a friend to a very energetic government. It is always oppressive."

The President then looked at his young audience and said, "You think about that sometimes when you read those hostile columnists who say I spend a lot of time napping." He hastened to add, but not until after the laughter had subsided, "I really don't."

Of course he doesn't nap on the job. Well, maybe there's some attention-wandering, such as on a presidential election I understand is coming up this year.

One reason so many voters found Mr. Reagan appealing in 1980 was that he promised to be innovative regarding, for example, the inner cities. But he warned that he couldn't do anything unless he got elected.

Since then he has invested too little personal capital in such things as urban enterprise zones, which, by enlisting the private sector in the war on poverty, might stand some chance of winning it.

But the wandering attention of the White House has made it easier for House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, a big man on the Democrats' campus, to hold up enterprise-zone legislation for the second year in a row. Where does this leave the Democrats, and what does it offer Mr. Reagan?

Despite their well-intentioned and expensive programs, the Democrats admit they have not been winning the battle against poverty. Yet here's one of their own leaders in the House who seems dead set against trying a new, less paternalistic and bureaucratic approach—because, presumably, a Republican in the White House would take some credit.

That Republican and his administration, however, belatedly raised enterprise zones as an issue warranting support in Congress. And so far there are no signs that Mr. Reagan will use its blockage by Democrats as a campaign issue. Too bad for the Republicans. Talk about missed opportunities!

Nor is there any sign so far from the Oval Office of getting behind the young populist Republicans in the House whose new ideas include removing the poor from the income-tax rolls and helping public housing tenants to buy their own units, affordably priced, thus giving them pride in ownership and a stake in their community.

A primary social issue of the campaign and of the coming years is how to extend the economic recovery to the inner cities and to assimilate more black citizens into the mainstream of the economy. This is a Republican populist concern; it's where, I think, the president's heart lies.

The other day I saw Walter Mondale's able campaign chairman, James A. Johnson, quoted as saying one of the failures of his man's primary campaign was "not being as competitive in the debate about issues relating to the future." Will Mr. Reagan's team be uttering a similar lament as November comes closer?

From Mr. Mondale's chief pollster, Peter D. Hart, I read another telling comment: "I don't know of anything Ronald Reagan has done that suggests he has an agenda for the future."

Mr. Reagan and his advisers may comfort themselves with the knowledge that this is somewhat of an overstatement. But it's too close to the truth for comfort to the Republican Young Turks in the House—names like Newt Gingrich, Bob Walker, Vin Weber, Dan Lungren, Barbara Vucanovich, Nancy Johnson, Connie Mack, and Jack Kemp. They talk about an "opportunity society" as the answer to what I would call the mixed successes of the Democrats' Great Society and New Frontier.

These Young Turks are articulate, antiracist, compassionate spokesmen for progress through enhancing individual opportunities, with emphasis on what they regard as the most demonstrably effective instrument for social change: the private sector.

With Mr. Reagan, they share Mr. Jefferson's distaste for the intrusiveness of big government. But, like Mr. Reagan, they see a positive role for government—by encouraging innovation in some cases and by simply not standing in the way in others.

Coupled with his gently self-deprecating humor, they may be the best capital Mr. Reagan has this election year.●

HERMITAGE: PENNSYLVANIA'S NEWEST CITY

HON. THOMAS J. RIDGE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to recognize Pennsylvania's newest city, Hermitage, which became an incorporated municipality on January 1, 1984. The citizens of Hermitage are to be commended for their outstanding community spirit, and I am proud to represent them in the U.S. House of Representatives.

Hermitage is strategically located within a 1-day drive of 52 percent of the country's population, between Pittsburgh and Erie. The city is near many major routes of transportation, and its 30 square miles of land makes it the third largest municipal land area in the State of Pennsylvania. The citizens have worked to build excellent educational, medical, and recreational facilities, in addition to making the most of their natural resources.

Hermitage's history began with its founding in 1832, during the administration of President Andrew Jackson. The city's original name, Hickory, was derived from Jackson's nickname. The current name, Hermitage, was the name of President Jackson's estate in Tennessee.

A portion of the Erie Canal, which opened in 1844, passed through Hermitage, and one of the locks still remains. The city was the site of the first steel mill in the Shenango Valley, built by F. H. Buhl. Coal was discovered and mined during the first half of the 19th century.

Several years ago, the city received a great deal of national attention when its patriotic citizens responded to the Iranian hostage crisis by erecting one American flag for each day of the hostages' captivity. The Avenue of Flags at Hillcrest Memorial Park became a national symbol of faith and hope for the duration of the crisis. At a time when some are concerned about a decline of patriotism, the flags still fly in Hermitage.

The sesquicentennial in 1982 was a happier occasion, and now the citizens have another reason to celebrate, since the town has become an incorporated municipality. I wish to offer my sincere congratulations and best wishes.●

TRIBUTE TO VETERANS' HOSPITALS

HON. LANE EVANS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if there are any doubts regarding the invaluable services provided by our Nation's veterans' hospitals and the individuals who work in them, a letter I recently received from Mrs. Sandie Carson of Lacon, IL, should dispel those doubts.

The sole purpose of Mrs. Carson's letter was to inform me of the unforgettably kind and thoughful treatment her late father received at the Veterans' Center in Danville due to the efforts of a gentleman I know well, Mr. Earle Peacock.

Earle is our local representative at the Illinois Department of Veterans' Affairs, and I am well aware of the outstanding support and guidance this remarkable man gives to the veterans and their families in our area.

But somehow, after reading this letter from a woman who did not know where to turn for help for her dying father, a proud war veteran, a simple "thank you" to Earle doesn't seem quite enough. This man touched the lives of a family during one of their most troubled moments. He understood their fears, provided answers to their questions, and offered much-needed moral support during their father's last days.

Mrs. Carson will never forget Earle Peacock. Neither will hundreds of others who have been touched by this man's kindness and generosity toward our Nation's veterans.

Thank you, Earle. From all of us.●

BATTLING WORLD HUNGER

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, recent passage of a $60 million supplemental for African food aid came none too soon. After delaying passage for 4 months—due to administration pressure to tie covert aid to the Nicaraguan Contras onto the famine relief—Congress finally had the good sense to jettison the clandestine war chest and get on with the business of feeding starving people.

Bread for the World's executive director Arthur Simon recently visited the famine-struck lands of Mozambique and Ethiopia. Mr. Simon reported that the trip confirmed his deepest fears:

Elders and babies, mothers and young men are dying because we have not provided them with enough food. In Mozambique, where about 100,000 deaths from starvation were reported in 1983, I saw men, women, and children foraging for leaves, grass, and bugs because there was no other food. Ethiopian officials told me of a food distribution camp where each day an average of 33 people succumb to starvation.

In my view it's intolerable and inexcusable the United States and other donor nations can permit this to happen when our own grain bins and dairy-storage facilities are overflowing. It's also ridiculous that we can not provide the meager funds needed for the speedy transportation and timely distribution of food aid.

As we approach the 30th anniversary of the Food for Peace Program on July 10, we should be prepared to do much more to fight hunger. The June meeting of the World Food Council in Ethiopia concluded that developing nations need at least $1 billion in added aid each year if progress is to be made in the Third World's battle against poverty and the hunger it breeds.

The WFC meeting report noted that, despite increased global food production over the past 10 years, "* * * the risks of food insecurity are now greater for many low-income developing countries." The delegates concluded that the world produces enough food to feed the Earth's people, yet millions still go to bed hungry each night.

The report stated starkly that:

Hunger today is largely a natural and man-made phenomenon: human error or neglect creates it, human complacency perpetuates it and human resolve can eradicate it.

As a result, the Council delegates reaffirmed "* * * hunger can be eradicated in our lifetime." Since over 100 colleagues joined Senator JACK DANFORTH, Representative JIM LEACH, and I in a letter urging a constructive U.S. role at the WFC meeting, I wanted to share highlights from the "Summary of Conclusions and Recommendations" with my colleagues.

Finally, I would ask my colleagues to prepare to provide needed supplemental food and transportation aid for fiscal year 1985 and to increase substantially our commitment to Food for Peace as we begin to draft a new multiyear farm bill. We can make no wiser investment in a humane cause and our own security.

Mr. Simon's timely article is included for the information of my colleagues.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, June 19, 1984]

FAMINE RELIEF

(By Arthur Simon)

A recent trip to Mozambique and Ethiopia, two countries hit hardest by famine, confirmed my deepest fears. Elders and babies, mothers and young men are dying because we have not provided them with enough food.

In Mozambique, where about 100,000 deaths from starvation were reported in 1983, I saw men, women, and children foraging for leaves, grass, and bugs because there was no other food. Ethiopian officials told me of a food distribution camp where each day an average of 33 people succumb to starvation.

The United Nations estimates that 100 million to 150 million Africans now face severe food shortages in 24 nations. Despite this, US responses to the immediate food needs in Africa have been erratic, ill-timed, and less than adequate.

Starvation is preventable! The United States is able to get the food where it is needed, if it is willing! Contrary to official US no-cause-for-alarm expressions during the first quarter of 1984, the African famine is out of control and most private relief experts warn that it will worsen.

Nevertheless, an uncontroversial and sorely needed $6 million food aid bonus for Africa has lain dormant in Congress for more than two months because administration allies attached controversial Central American military aid amendments to it. The $60 million supplement is important to Africa, but not the pending military aid packages.

There must also be an increase in the 1985 food aid appropriations to Africa of at least $150 million to raise next year's funding up to 1984 levels. Without this additional money, Congress probably would have to wrestle with requests again when money runs out after Christmas.

Food aid, however, will not be very effective unless nonfood aid—trucks, fuel, spare parts—also is supplied.

We must be prepared to fly in shipments of food to Africa's remote regions if necessary. We must undergird transportation, thus guaranteeing food for mothers too nutritionally depleted to nurse their children and for children crippled by malnutrition. We must move food supplies more rapidly and systematically.

Reports indicate that for every $3 million of food aid, $1 million is needed for transportation. The US has delivered or committed $140 million in food aid to Africa this year but has expected it to be moved from ports to very remote areas with only $8 million in logistical support.

The Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance (OFDA) has an annual $25 million account for nonfood needs worldwide, but the money was virtually depleted long before the end of the 1984 fiscal year. They could put to good use a $100 million increase in nonfood emergency aid for 1985.

And what about long-term aid for Africa?

The Reagan administration's $500 million Economic Policy Initiative (EPI) will help Africa in the years to come if funds are targeted not only to economic growth but to growth with equity, so that the poorest people in recipient countries get direct benefits as well as the elite. EPI must not, however, become a substitute for emergency food supplies. Long-term aid should not be used as a cover-up for lagging short-term relief aid.

We are able to do these things. But are we willing?

On the eve of the 30th anniversary celebration of the US Food for Peace program July 10, I call upon President Reagan to make a more comprehensive and equitable commitment to the 24 African nations affected by famine.

Mr. Reagan stood on the shores of Normandy earlier this month and posed as Europe's military savior and peacekeeper. He should also come forward and promise US humanitarian aid resources to deliver millions from the horrors of starvation.

The administration, the Congress, and the American people must demand swift action, now. To debate and confer and delay emergency food and nonfood aid supplies leaves totally in the lurch millions depending on us for support.●

FAIR INSURANCE COVERAGE ACT

HON. JIM BATES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, this week the House Energy Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism held a hearing on H.R. 4642, the Fair Insurance Coverage Act. This bill, which I introduced, would prohibit discrimination against the blind in insurance. Members of the subcommittee listened to the blind community explain how the insurance industry has made their lives difficult by denying and limiting insurance coverage without an actuarial basis. In today's Washington Post, Judy Mann tells the story of one of my constituents, Louis Lucero. Although he is a healthy athlete capable of running marathons, he cannot obtain life insurance. I encourage my colleagues to read Judy Mann's column and support H.R. 4642, the Fair Insurance Coverage Act.

INSURABILITY

Louis Lucero is 28 years old and, until his knees started bothering him several years ago, he was a marathoner. He was a varsity letterman on the track team all four years in both high school and college, and was also captain of the cross-country team during his senior year of college. And he has been blind since birth.

Lucero, who now works as a drug rehabilitation counselor at the naval air station in San Diego, came to Washington this week to tell the House subcommittee on commerce, transportation and tourism what happened to him after he graduated from college and applied for a life insurance policy.

He wanted a policy that provided an accidental death, disability and waiver of premium clause, a standard policy many people buy to protect their family and themselves.

The company he went to was willing to sell him basic life insurance, but refused to sell him the extra protections "simply because I had been legally blind since birth," he testified. The result, he said, was that he was denied "coverage for a possible future disability which would be totally unrelated to blindness.

"On the very day of my denial of insurance coverage, I was a 24-year-old, healthy, physically fit individual capable of running in a 30-mile marathon. I was not an individual with a past history of poor physical health which would be detrimental to the insurance company and which would justify denial of coverage."

He said, "My first effort to establish my financial stability as an independent adult resulted in an obstacle I could not get around. No amount of explanation or pleading with the insurance company brought me the insurance coverage I sought."

Lucero, who was able to run by touching partners, was the most dramatic example of a physically fit person being denied coverage because of blindness, but he was by no means alone.

Dr. Harold Snider of the District, who is president of the Society for the Advancement of Travel for the Handicapped, told of several instances in which he had been discriminated against in insurance because of his blindness. He said he had to pay more for whole-life insurance and found he could not get double indemnity or waiver of premium features in case of disability. On another occasion, when he left federal service and wanted to convert to an individual policy, he found that companies wanted to charge him double or triple the standard rate because he was blind.

"The only ways in which I am able to purchase travel insurance without discrimination are by using the vending machines or by using the automatic travel insurance feature on my American Express card," he said. "Personnel at airport insurance counters have consistently refused to sell me travel insurance because of my blindness."

John T. Snore, vice president for underwriting at the Prudential Insurance Co., submitted findings from a study of mortality rates that showed in some age and illness categories, the blind had higher mortality rates than people who can see, while in other categories—particularly for older blind people—they had a lower mortality rate.

He said the industry is opposed to federal legislation banning discrimination against the blind in the insurance industry because they are already protected under the unfair trade practices acts of various states. Further, he said, 35 states have passed legislation or regulations to specifically protect the blind against discrimination by the insurance industry.

The proposed federal legislation has been introduced by Representative Jim Bates (D-Calif.) and Senator Charles McC. Mathias (R-Md.). The measures would allow a blind person to bring suit in federal court if he got no relief through a state regulatory agency within 180 days after filing a claim. The bills would also prevent companies from denying coverage or charging higher premiums solely on the basis of blindness.

There are an estimated half a million people who are legally blind, according to the American Foundation for the Blind, some of whom have been blind since birth, others of whom have lost their sight through accidents or disease. The problems they face in acquiring insurance may seem esoteric to those of us who are sighted, but to the men and women who appeared at the subcommittee hearing with canes and guide dogs, they are very real.

They, like the rest of us, have families they want to protect.●

PRIVATE PSYCHIATRIC HOSPITALS AND PROSPECTIVE PAYMENT

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the National Association of Private Psychiatric Hospitals [NAPPH] is presently undertaking a research project designed to test the feasibility of several different methods of prospective payment for private psychiatric hospitals. These nongovernmental hospitals are currently exempt from the medicare diagnostic related groups [DRG's] until the Health Care Financing Administration determines whether and how these hospitals will be brought under the prospective payment system.

This study done by the NAPPH will look at 9,000 patients of all ages who received care last year in private psychiatric hospitals. The study will not rely solely on patient diagnosis and length of stay as the criteria for hospital payment, since both of these factors vary widely for people who are mentally ill. The study will also focus on the availability of family and/or community mental health support services, severity of illness, and intensity of therapy. Also, the study intends to examine the possibility of a prospective payment system per diem based on the type of program the patient needs. The hospital resources used by an elderly person suffering from acute depression, an adolescent addicted to drugs, and a middle-aged adult executive with a serious drinking problem differ considerably. The NAPPH study will be examining these types of differences in order to reflect accurately the needs of the mentally ill.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important undertaking on the part of the private sector health care community. It is financed solely by the NAPPH membership. The member hospitals are concerned with rising health care costs and they are acutely aware of the need to establish a workable and fair payment system for facilities which treat the aged mentally ill. In the next few years, we in Congress will have to grapple with the difficult issues of reforming the medicare program to guarantee its fiscal survival and to provide efficient and compassionate health care for all Americans. Efforts such as this study should be encouraged, because it is only through a creative working relationship between the private and public sector that we will be able to solve the problems facing medicare.

This study is consistent with the excellent record of the NAPPH. Over the years, NAPPH member hospitals have worked to maintain a high standard of care for the mentally ill. The 215 member hospitals can be found in all parts of the country, caring for 177,000 patients each year. I am proud to say, Mr. Speaker, that two of these hospitals—South Oaks Hospital and Brunswick Psychiatric Hospital—are located in my own district on Long Island. The clinical expertise and program specialization provided by the NAPPH membership have played an important role in assisting the Congress and administration in developing appropriate legislative and regulatory policies for private psychiatric hospitals in such areas as accreditation criteria, alcoholism and partial hospitalization guidelines, and child and adolescent treatment standards.

The NAPPH commitment to providing the highest quality care for the mentally ill continues with its study on "Alternative Forms of Prospective Reimbursement for Speciality Psychiatric Hospitals." I commend the NAPPH for its work and I look forward to seeing the results.●

COMPROMISE HELPS MEDICARE BENEFICIARIES

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House passed the Deficit Reduction Act by a vote of 268 to 155. This bill included several changes in Medicare law—some at the expense of beneficiaries, some at the expense of physicians, and some at the expense of hospitals, laboratories, and other providers. I voted for this legislation, and I would like to explain why.

It is common knowledge that the medicare system faces financial despair. Put quite simply, more money is going out than is coming in. The central cause of this imbalance is the astronomical rise in health care costs in recent years. Virtually all parts of the health care dollar—physician charges, hospital bills, medicine costs, insurance payments—have inflated at double-digit rates.

Why have costs risen so dramatically? New health care technologies are expensive. A liver transplant can cost $200,000; one examination of body tissue with the Nuclear Magnetic Resonance machine costs $700. People are living longer and are therefore using more health care. Consumers have sued health care without questioning whether the benefits outweigh the costs. Physicians have ordered extra tests and tried methods of treatment to protect themselves from malpractice cases. Nearby hospitals compete with each other, duplicating expensive equipment. Health care payment systems have simply reimbursed physicians and hospitals for whatever care was provided, without setting standard payments or encouraging cost control.

In short, we all share the blame for high health care costs. We took a first step in controlling costs and bringing down Medicare's budget when we enacted the new Medicare payment system to hospitals. Now that hospitals have begun feeling the effects of the new system, the rest of us should determine how we can help save Medicare. The Deficit Reduction Act tries to distribute the burden as fairly as possible.

Part of the burden falls on physicians. Physician fees are frozen for 15 months, from July 1, 1984 until October 1, 1985. During this freeze period, physicians would be prohibited from increasing not only the amounts charged to the Federal Government, but also the amounts charged directly to Medicare patients. The Deficit Reduction Act provides some incentives to encourage physicians to accept the charges allowed by Medicare as payment in full, and provides assistance to patients in locating doctors who have agreed to do so.

Part of the burden falls on beneficiaries. Patients may choose to enroll in Medicare part B, which pays for physician services. They pay a monthly premium for this insurance, which is currently $14.60. This monthly payment covers about 25 percent of the cost of the program. The original Medicare law requires enrollees to pay 50 percent of the program's cost. As the cost of the program rises, the monthly premium also rises. The Deficit Reduction Act would require part B enrollees to continue paying 25 percent of the program's cost, even if the monthly premium increase is more than the Social Security cost-of-living adjustment.

Part of the burden falls on hospitals and independent laboratories. Independent labs are required to accept Medicare payment as payment in full, without charging the patient. The rate of increase in payments to hospitals is again limited. Reimbursement to hospital owners for capital-related costs is limited. There are a number of other technical changes to decrease costs, such as a revision in the rules for selecting contractors to process Medicare claims.

Mr. Speaker, I believe these changes exemplify the kind of compromises we must continue to make to ensure Medicare's solvency. We cannot balance Medicare's budget on the backs of the elderly. We cannot place all of the burden on physicians and hospitals. But when we all sacrifice a little, as we have in the Deficit Reduction Act, we can save $6.7 billion in the Medicare program over a 4-year period. I have reluctantly come to realize that agreeing to this kind of compromise is far better than doing nothing and allowing the system to go bankrupt. I commend my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee, especially Chairman Rostenkowski, for working to resolve a terrible problem as painlessly as possible.●

MERGER FINANCING

HON. COOPER EVANS

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. EVANS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, a number of recent large corporate mergers and acquisitions have focused public attention on the enormous sums of money tied up in the financing of such ventures. Since the beginning of this year, three proposed oil company mergers have been announced which would have a total market value of $29.2 billion if completed. Two of these all-cash purchases—Socal-Gulf, $13.4 billion and Texaco-Getty, $10.1 billion—for a total of $23.5 billion in cash.

This is just the latest chapter of a growing trend toward corporate mergers and acquisitions. In the years 1981 through 1983, the total value of these mergers and acquisitions was placed at more than $209 billion. This is an amount greater than even the most pessimistic estimate of Federal deficit. Of these transactions, 366 involved funds of more than $100 million each. These activities tie up capital that is badly needed by the economy for other purposes.

Market conditions are a primary reason for the large number of recent mergers. Inflation and high interest rates have depreciated the value of corporate assets and have increased the reluctance to risk new ventures. Mergers have thus become safer and cheaper alternatives for these corporations than modernizing or expanding their existing plants and equipment.

To finance these mergers, corporations are borrowing billions of dollars at high interest rates. This type of borrowing is largely unproductive since borrowing for a merger creates nothing new. A corporation simply buys another existing operation. Billions of dollars of borrowed money are invested for something that neither creates a new job nor increases productivity. In fact, mergers actually increase the competition for the limited amount of money available in the lending markets and tend to keep all interest rates high.

The goal of the administration's economic program is to lower interest rates and to provide capital for plant expansion and to create more job opportunities. Borrowing to finance mergers runs counter to this program and its goals.

The Federal Government's tax policy also contributes to the problem. Interest paid on funds borrowed to finance mergers is deductible from income taxes. This means that there is just as much incentive for a large corporation to borrow for a merger as there is to borrow for plant expansion or modernization.

United States Steel should be borrowing to refurbish its plants and to increase productivity. Other corporations should be borrowing for new equipment and expansion to create new jobs. Mergers yield none of these benefits, but rather they contribute to the continuation of high interest rates that are causing so many problems for consumers, farmers, and small businessmen.

We need to change our Federal tax policy to stop encouraging and subsidizing mergers of giant corporations, particularly in periods of tight money. We need to create more jobs and more efficient industry, not more conglomerates. With this goal in mind, I am introducing legislation which would end, for a temporary period of time, the tax deductibility of interest on loans made to finance large corporate mergers.

My bill would allow the President to declare a moratorium on the deductibility of interest for a period of not longer than 2 years. This moratorium could be lifted at any time during the 2 years if the President determined that it was no longer required. During and after the moratorium period, corporations would not be able to deduct the interest payments on indebtedness incurred during the moratorium to acquire other corporate stock or assets. While this would not prevent mergers, it would eliminate one important feature of our tax laws which serves to encourage this activity.

I believe that it is best to give the flexibility to the President to determine when this moratorium should go into effect because I feel that this course of action should be used only in times of economic emergency. The President would be in a position to respond more quickly than the Congress and would be more inclined to invoke these emergency powers than Congress would be to make permanent changes in the Tax Code.

Another important feature of my bill is that it would not affect mergers where less than $5 million is borrowed. This figure is already in the Tax Code as the result of previous legislation and I believe that it should be retained in order to allow the merger or acquisition of small distressed businesses without penalty.

I believe this type of legislation is urgently needed if we are to make any progress in reducing interest rates, bringing down the Federal deficit, and getting this Nation on the road to full economic recovery.●

A TRIBUTE TO HECTOR M. SANCHEZ

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today with my colleague, Mr. EDWARDS, to bring to the attention of the House an exceptional act of heroism displayed by a man from the 13th Congressional District of California. This courageous citizen, Hector M. Sanchez of San Jose, saved James M. Bryant, 26, from burning on March 28, 1983. The Carnegie Hero Commission awarded a medal to Mr. Sanchez in recognition of his remarkable action.

Arriving on the scene of a highway accident, Mr. Sanchez, a coach operator in San Jose, crawled into a burning car through a broken window and opened one of the car's doors. The front-seat area was in flames where Mr. Sanchez entered the car and attempted to free the driver. Mr. Sanchez was quickly forced out of the car by heat, smoke, and increasing flames. He reentered the burning car and was finally able to successfully free the driver. Mr. Bryant was rescued and brought to safety shortly before the entire car was engulfed in flames. I am happy to report that both Mr. Bryant and Mr. Sanchez have fully recovered from their injuries.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join with me today in paying tribute to Hector M. Sanchez. I am proud to recognize this heroic award and extend my gratitude and best wishes.●

THE PLIGHT OF ETHIOPIAN JEWS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity provided by this special order to draw attention to the plight of the Ethiopian Jews and to build support for humanitarian efforts to assist them.

This dwindling group of African Jews are a unique people with a past that is veiled in mystery. For more than 2,000 years, they clung to their Jewish roots, believing that they were the only Jews left in the world. Through oppression, drought, and warfare, their numbers have been decimated until now fewer than 20,000 remain in Ethiopia.

Today their greatest needs are food and medicine but the means to transport these supplies to the remote areas where they subsist is a difficult problem. Most of them would like to emigrate to Israel where thousands have settled in recent years. While Israel stands ready to receive them, their emigration is an operation fraught with difficulty.

No discussion of the Ethiopian Jews could be complete without mention of the various theories on their origin. Many Ethiopian Jews claim that during the exodus, the waters of the Red Sea closed before all the Jews could cross. Those left behind wandered south and settled in Ethiopia.

The Israeli rabbinate believes that the Ethiopian Jews are the remnants of the lost Tribe of Dan that escaped or was abducted by the Assyrians and traveled as migrants and blacksmiths via Egypt to Ethiopia. Secular scholars, on the other hand, claim that the Ethiopian Jews are descendants of Africans who intermarried with Jews and converted to their faith.

For many centuries, they were cut off from all other Jews. They were unaware of post-Biblical holidays like Chanukah and Purim and writings such as the Talmud, but they faithfully observed the Sabbath, festivals, and fast days as prescribed in the Old Testament of the Bible.

Their influence reached its height during the 10th century when the warrior queen Yehudit, a Jew, ruled Ethiopia, battling the Christians for 40 years. Claiming descent from Solomon, she interrupted the Amhara dynasty and gained a peace for the Ethiopian Jews which lasted until the Emperor Yeshaq allied with the Muslims to seize power in Ethiopia 300 years later. His decree depriving the Ethiopian Jews of property rights marked the beginning of their long decline.

By the early 17th century, the Ethiopian Jews had greatly diminished in strength and numbers. Poverty stricken, illiterate, and forbidden from openly practicing Jewish laws or owning land, they became sharecroppers and craftsmen. They were persecuted and called the Falasha, a pejorative term that means stranger or outcast from society. By the 19th century, their numbers had dwindled to 250,000 and by the beginning of this century, a mere 50,000 remained.

After the overthrow of Emperor Haile Selassie in 1974, the Jewish population, caught in the crossfire of warring factions, declined still further. Moreover, like other Ethiopians, they are victims of the drought and famine that has crippled the Horn of Africa and other regions of the continent in recent years and that recurred with a vengeance in 1983.

The Jews are eager to make aliyah to Israel but it is illegal for any Ethiopian to emigrate. Many have trekked through the Simian Mountains of western Ethiopia, to refugee camps in the Sudan, where they feign Christianity in an effort to obtain better treatment. Food and medical supplies are scarce in the camps, and the refugees suffer from malnutrition and a variety of debilitating diseases. A large number of the Jews who are still in Ethiopia will not be able to leave without assistance because they are too young, too old, or too sick for the rugged journey to the Sudan.

I was part of a study mission that visited Ambober, one of the Ethiopian Jewish villages last August. I returned from the trip deeply concerned about the extreme hardship faced by the Jews as well as other Ethiopians and their inability to emigrate freely. The vivid reality of viewing the harsh effects of the drought and malnutrition impressed on me the urgency of increasing and expediting U.S. famine relief to the people of Ethiopia as well as to other famine-stricken peoples of Africa.

Because the famine is threatening the lives of millions, it is imperative that we step up our food and transportation assistance to Africa. In addition, we should encourage efforts to maintain a dialog with the Ethiopian Government on the welfare and rights of Ethiopian Jews and approve House Concurrent Resolution 107 which calls on the President to express the concern of the American people for the welfare of the Ethiopian Jewish community in every appropriate forum. I urge my colleagues to support these measures and all other efforts to help relieve the suffering of Ethiopian Jews.●

THE EQUAL ACCESS BILL

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, although the House defeated the so-called equal access bill when it came up under suspension last month, it now looks as if we will consider the matter again. The other body has passed a modified form of "equal access" and attached it to the House-passed Emergency Math and Science Education Act that has languished on the other side of Capitol Hill for over a year.

Mr. Speaker, I remain opposed to this well-intentioned but misdirected effort. I share the intentions of the bill's sponsors that religious expression be given equal weight with other forms of free speech. As a United Methodist minister, I am well aware of the benefits to be derived from religion in general and prayer in particular. However, I believe that the equal access bill is the wrong way to proceed toward the goals of free speech and religious freedom.

The bill violates existing law by promoting excessive Government entanglement in religion. Faculty would have to be present at meetings of religious groups; administrators would have to decide which clubs could and could not meet, and where in the building. I do not believe that most people want to spend their tax dollars to pay teachers to oversee religious meetings. I do not believe that most people want to allow everyone who calls him or herself a religious leader, including cult leaders, to enter the schools. I believe that our schools should be reserved for education, and that as parents we should take it upon ourselves to give our children a strong, quality religious education outside of the school. In particular, I advocate the use of churches and synagogues before and after school for students to meet to worship.

God is always with us, and I believe that religious people should take time during the day to reaffirm their faith. However, I also believe that among the great principles of American democracy are toleration of diversity and the separation of church and state. To permit school religious observances under the terms of the equal access legislation would violate these principles.

Today's Philadelphia Inquirer includes a cogent, well-reasoned editorial pointing out that "the opportunities for abuse, for discord, for discrimination and hard feelings are plentiful enough in the schools without stirring in religion." I commend this editorial to my colleagues; it will be included in the RECORD following my remarks. We should consider most carefully the arguments raised by the Inquirer before voting again on "equal access."

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, June 29, 1984]

INVITING RELIGION INTO SCHOOL

Senator Jeremiah Denton (R., Ala.) summed up his handiwork nicely. The Senate had just passed, 88-11, a Denton measure that would encourage high school students to organize religious activities at school. "Because of a number of court rulings," he said, "there was a sealed door keeping any practice of religion out of the schools. Now that seal has been broken."

"This is not a foot in the door, this is an epic change."

There are many, of course—though apparently not many senators—who believe religion is just as well kept out of public schools. The opportunity for abuse, for discord, for discrimination and hard feelings are plentiful enough in the schools without stirring in religion.

But that's talking practical schoolday politics, not legalisms. And on legal grounds, the Senate has cleared away some of the problems that an earlier House version of the proposal presented. (The House last month voted 270-151 in favor of a so-called "equal access" measure, but it failed because it fell short of a two-thirds majority required under special shortcut rules.)

No longer would federal funding be terminated if a school failed to allow students to hold religious meetings. Nor would meetings be allowed automatically during the school day. They would be confined primarily to before or after school hours. No longer would political or philosophical clubs be excluded from the same protections.

Those changes probably have made the measure more court-proof and sounder from a free speech perspective. But the technical virtuosity of the measure hides its ultimate objective and the eventualities it may well visit on beleaguered school boards, teachers and parents.

The ultimate objective is, as Mr. Denton proudly declared, "an epic change" in breaking down the "sealed door" between church and state. "We can probably get it into the grade schools," Mr. Denton said enthusiastically.

What the Senate has done is simply to replace the battering ram of the school-prayer amendment with a hammer and chisel. It may not signal an epic change, but it is unhealthy.

Should it pass—and its attachment to a popular $1 billion math and science funding bill gives it a high-powered vehicle in the House-Senate conference committee—Americans can look forward to several unappetizing scenarios: Cults and evangelicals soliciting teenage recruits at the schoolhouse door, claims of religious bias by students against teachers and vice versa, efforts to expand religious practices in the schools and efforts to contain them by defensive administrators who will ban extracurricular activities altogether.

Such scenarios serve neither the cause of religious freedom or of public education. They will stir the winds of intolerance, undermine secular harmony and, finally, visit turmoil and pain on communities where religious proselyting descends on the schoolhouse. The door is better sealed.●

NATIONAL PRESS FREEDOM DAY

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today to join my colleague from Michigan [Mr. VANDER JAGT] in introducing a House joint resolution, designating August 4, 1985, as "Press Freedom Day" in the United States. As a fundamental liberty designed to ensure participation by an informed people in their government, it is important for this Nation not only to express its appreciation of press freedom, but to rededicate itself to the highest principles of an unfettered flow of information.

August 4, 1985, marks the 250th anniversary of the landmark decision in the case of John Peter Zenger of colonial New York. The publisher of a weekly journal, Zenger was charged with libel by the Governor of New York for articles exposing corruption in the colonial government. In a stirring courtoom defense of Zenger, attorney Andrew Hamilton argued for the right of any newspaper to print the truth for the common good of the people. The decision exonerating Zenger served as a watershed event in freedom of the press in this land.

The commitment to public information systems working free of government censorship was clearly evident in the drafting of our Nation's Bill of Rights. The influence of Thomas Jefferson, George Mason, and James Madison encouraged members of the Constitutional Convention to view press freedom as "one of the great bulwarks of liberty." By embodying freedom of the press in the first amendment to the Constitution, our Nation demonstrated unprecedented trust in the ability of a well-informed public to be full participants in government.

Our Nation's support for freedom of the press actually represents a significant placement of faith in the people. Through more than 200 years of journalistic history, our Nation's courts have defended the public's "right to know," and the impropriety of government censorship efforts in which national security issues were not at stake. In the landmark case of New York Times Co. against United States, Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black stressed the inviolability of the first amendment guarantees: "The Founding Fathers gave the free press the protection it must have to fulfill its essential role in our democracy. The press was to serve the governed, not the governors." And so it has. And through such service our Nation is arguably the best informed society in history.

There have been times when the commitment to freedom of the press was not easy to maintain. There have been attempts to control the media, limit its inquisitive nature, or discourage its publication efforts. But despite the episodic setbacks, press freedom remains as vital today as when the first amendment was ratified in 1791. That vitality serves as an inspiration for millions of men and women throughout the world whose understanding of events is marred by the tunnel vision produced by State controlled media in their homelands.

By establishing a Press Freedom Day, we can rededicate ourselves to one of the principle liberties that has guided this Nation on an epic journey from the printshop of John Peter Zenger to the era of satellite communications. "Press freedom is not safety," wrote journalist Zechariah Chafee, Jr., in 1948, "but an opportunity." I encourage my colleagues in the House to join me and the distinguished gentleman from Michigan in supporting this important resolution to remind our Nation of the great opportunity provided Americans through freedom of the press. May our commemoration of this event lead us as a nation to rededicate ourselves to the preservation of this great principle.●

TRIBUTE TO DR. C. HENRY KEMPE

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, Dr. C. Henry Kempe, who has done more than any other human being to help abused and neglected children the world over, died on March 8, 1984.

Professor and chairman of the Department of Pediatrics at the School of Medicine, University of Colorado from 1956 to 1973, Dr. Kempe first coined the term "battered child syndrome" and published his findings in a Journal of the American Medical Association article in 1962. Recognizing that child abuse was a widespread and growing problem, he undertook the difficult task of convincing physicians, nurses, law enforcement officials, and politicians about the extent of the problem. Until Dr. Kempe's tireless efforts, the problem of child abuse was basically ignored. He refused to accept that the cause of a child's injury was accidental, when the evidence showed otherwise. He was the first to take this brave stand.

Largely due to his work, by 1970, most States had passed legislation to address the phenomenon of child maltreatment. And in 1974, the Congress passed Federal legislation—the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act—to collect nationwide statistics, conduct specific research, and assist States in their effort to identify and treat victims of child abuse and neglect.

Dr. Kempe's efforts on behalf of maltreated children did not stop with recognition and identification of the problem. He was vitally concerned with developing effective treatment models which enable families to stay together, and effective prevention methods. To carry out this critical work, he founded the C. Henry Kempe National Center for the Prevention and Treatment of Child Abuse and Neglect. The center has been a model for thousands of child protection teams throughout the world.

The current director, Dr. Richard Krugman, gave one of the most important pieces of testimony heard by the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families as we conducted our first year assessment of current conditions among the children and families of America. He traced the connection between unemployment and changes in the incidence and severity of child abuse.

Dr. Kempe was regarded as the world's leading authority on child maltreatment. Victims of child abuse and neglect everywhere, and the societies they live in, owe Dr. Kempe a tremendous debt of gratitude.●

CARL HANSEN—A SOURCE OF JOY TO COUNTLESS CHILDREN

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues a great children's entertainer who has been a source of fun and joy to the children of California for several decades and has been known to generations of those children as "Hocus Pocus," the clown and magician. His real name is Carl Hansen, and Mr. Hansen is being honored with a surprise ball to celebrate his 80th birthday on July 27. I know my colleagues join me in congratulating him on his long career and on the fine work he has done with so many children.

Born in Denmark, Mr. Hansen started in entertainment as a stuntman for Warner Bros. in 1927. Later, he learned magic, and that became the primary source of his act. During the World War II, Mr. Hansen served the USO as a master of ceremonies, magician, and comedian.

Mr. Hansen and his wife, Florene, lost two children at a very early age. From that point, he dedicated himself to entertaining and helping children. He made a practice of visiting sick and crippled children, a practice which continues to this day. It was during those visits to hospitals that he got the name "Hocus Pocus" in the performance of his magic act.

Eventually, "Hocus Pocus" began his own television program on KNTV in San Jose, and he was on the air for 9 years, a record for the longest running daily children's television program in northern California. He has continued his program on cable television.

In 1969, he returned to his native country and performed before an audience of over 20,000 at Tivoli in Copenhagen.

Mr. Hansen served for 2 years as president of the Society of American Magicians—in 1955 and 1956—and he is a member of Saahareens, a society of professional magicians.

Mr. Speaker, Carl Hansen, in addition to performing in this country and his native Denmark, has performed in Mexico, Canada, Germany, and Sweden. He is truly an international figure, and we are proud and fortunate to have had him entertaining our children in the San Jose and Santa Cruz areas for these many years. We all wish him a very happy birthday and the best of luck for the future.●

POLICE ROLLCALL OF HEROES—1983

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on May 18 I paid a special tribute to the courageous law enforcement officers of our Nation who lost their lives in the line of duty during 1983. As part of that tribute I included the names of those law enforcement heroes, and listed them by State. The list numbered 147, and included 7 police officers from New York. William L. McKechnie, president of the New York City Transit Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, recently informed me that one of his organization's members, New York City Transit Police Officer Joseph Hamperian died of a line of duty injury in 1983, but was not included on the Rollcall of Heroes for 1983. I regret that omission and want to provide Officer Hamperian the special tribute that he deserves by resubmitting the Rollcall of Heroes for 1983, with Officer Hamperian's name added:

THE 50TH WEDDING CELEBRATION FOR MR. AND MRS. NAIFEH

HON. ED JONES

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to share with my colleagues a joyous and happy celebration which will be held in my district while we are in recess in July. It is a celebration on July 22d commemorating the 50th wedding anniversary of my dear friends, Mr. and Mrs. Oney Naifeh of Covington, TN. I share this particular anniversary with my friends in the House of Representatives because Mr. and Mrs. Naifeh are truly special people. They represent to all of us the best anyone could hope for in their lives together.

Mr. and Mrs. Naifeh, during the course of their lifetimes, know what it means to leave their homeland and come to a land with which they had no personal knowledge—not even the basic knowledge of the language. Mr. Naifeh came to the United States from Lebanon at age 10. As they grew into adulthood, he and Mrs. Naifeh had a courtship just like you and I had.

From there, they embarked together, always together, on a life that has been dedicated to their family, their business, their community, and their country. Both have been active in their community in offering a helping hand to those in need. They have dedicated themselves to the spirit and determination that has made our country great and have participated fully in the process which we call representational government.

Most importantly, they have been devoted parents and are now just as devoted to their grandchildren. There is no one I know of who has been better at not only raising their children, but doing it in such a way that they instill in them deep love and affection for one another, respect and pride for their country, and generosity in their efforts to help others who are less fortunate. Those are the principles on which Mr. and Mrs. Naifeh have based a long and happy life together.

They are dear, dear friends of mine and have meant much to me over the years. They embody everything that we aspire to be, and because of that, I felt obliged to pay special tribute to them in today's RECORD. I extend to Mr. and Mrs. Naifeh my fondest best wishes on this important milestone in their lives. They have much to be proud of, and I want to express my own pride at being able to count them among my closest friends.●

NUNN SENSE: BURDEN SHARING FOR SECURITY

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, Senator SAM NUNN recently lost a surprisingly close vote on his amendment to reduce U.S. troop levels in NATO unless our allies shape up.

The Nunn amendment to the defense authorization bill would have begun in 1987 a phased reduction in U.S. troop strength in Western Europe unless our allies:

First, Increased defense spending by the NATO goal of 3 percent real growth, or Second, Build up conventional ammunition stockpiles and airbase facilities for 1,500 U.S. fighter planes.

Without satisfactory action by NATO allies, the United States would start in 1987 to bring home up to 30,000 troops a year for 3 years. A fair test for the allies and a fair response for the United States.

Critics of this move called it the "annual complaint in Congress" about the failure of allied burden sharing. Others argued that such "bullying tactics" would backfire since our allies only recently had accepted the first installments of Cruise and Pershing II missiles.

Wrong on both counts. Senator NUNN offered not a complaint but a plan to beef up collective security. He sought not to bully our allies with threats of withdrawal, but to keep us in the alliance with an improved defense effort.

A close look shows that the Nunn amendment could produce mutual benefits for the United States and NATO. By reducing U.S. costs, the result would be fewer Federal deficits and a more stable international marketplace. The alliance would gain military strength by reducing NATO's dependence on the nuclear tripwire—a principal concern of Europeans themselves. Both sides would benefit from understanding clearly the political price of an alliance: either you carry your share or the alliance must change radically. And change it must.

If Western Europe wishes to exercise greater independence from the United States than in 1945, a welcome event, then it must shoulder the responsibility to go with it. As former Army War College professor, William V. Kennedy observed, "Europe has all the human economic, and industrial resources it needs to defend itself with no more than a nominal U.S. presence." No less a proponent supporter of NATO cooperation than former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger has argued that if Western Europe does not assume greater control of the alliance, then the United States should withdraw up to 50 percent of its ground forces.

The times are changing and this is not 1945. Unless our allies start pulling in tandem for freedom, our collective defense will suffer and so will our own efforts to reduce alarming deficits. Our common NATO goal should be to create a united, rearmed Western Europe—to make the Soviets face two superpowers rather than one. But the American taxpayer cannot expect the United States to shell out over $90 billion a year for the defense of Europe—unless our allies pull their own weight.

To expand on this debate, I wish to include for the RECORD an incisive article, "Putting Europe to the Test," by Stephen S. Rosenfeld.

[From the Washington Post, June 22, 1984]

PUTTING A TEST TO EUROPE

(Stephen S. Rosenfeld)

Just 10 years ago this week Sen. Sam Nunn established himself as a NATO heavyweight by sidetracking the Mansfield Amendment's call for unilateral cuts of American forces in Europe. This week the Georgia Democrat put in his own, superficially similar amendment. It could be the foreign policy event of the decade.

The reason is that Nunn, by his place in a changing spectrum and by his personal stature, is the single person in a position to make happen the major revision of NATO military and political strategy that others have only talked about, without results, all these years.

True, it is not going to happen at this precise moment. The Senate rejected the Nunn Amendment Wednesday night. But time, his purposefulness and the momentum of events seem to be clearly on his side.

Nunn is forcing three basic tests on Europe:

Whether it will make the extra (not extravagant) commitment it will take to put up its share of a credible conventional defense.

Whether it will thereby raise the point at which NATO, in the event that its conventional forces were being overrun, would have to choose between caving in or going nuclear.

Whether it will put its relationship with the United States on a more solid basis in which Europe accepts a defense responsibility in keeping with its resources and with the demands of a mature modern alliance.

It takes a stout heart to have stuck with the debate over NATO in recent years. The tugs and pulls have served mainly to frazzle the parties. A schizophrenic Europe has felt we were going to do something rash and nuclear and abandon the continent to the Kremlin. An increasingly irritated United States has felt that Europe was either freeloading or preparing to turn neutralist. There has been much sweating over particular issues, like the missiles, and otherwise a fading into lofty appeals to togetherness or into impossibly grand architectural designs.

Nunn's contribution to this confused scene is to provide a place where this latter-day Archimedes can stand while he moves an awfully important piece of the Atlantic world.

Shape up in conventional defense, he says to the Europeans: meet the agreed 3 percent annual defense hikes or increase munitions stockpiles and prepare facilities for quick American reinforcements, again as long promised. Or, Nunn goes on, after a two-year warning, the United States will start shipping out up to 30,000 troops a year for three years, reducing our strength to 236,000—still a perfectly good "tripwire" to ensure our involvement in a Soviet attack.

The "burden-sharing" part of Nunn's case tends to the blood-boiling. We're surpassing NATO targets, the allies drag far behind. They've built none of the shelters and only 20 percent of the other facilities needed for the 1,500 extra planes we'd send if the bell rang. We're spending $52 billion over the next five years for spare munitions; they're doing little or nothing.

Still, the more fundamental argument is strategic. If Moscow attacked, NATO could fight only for "days, not weeks" before going nuclear, says the NATO commander, Gen. Bernard Rogers—hardly the credible deterrent that Europe craves. So for $90 billion a year (30 percent of the defense budget), we're buying a NATO strategy that leads straight to the nuclear escalator. If the Europeans won't do enough to keep the nuclear wolf an attainable and credit 30 days from their own door, says Nunn, let's at least trim our own costs.

It's the wrong time, he was told. His amendment will only traumatize the Europeans and cheer the Russians: good cause, bad tactic. These arguments and the administration's extraordinary arm-twisting prevailed this time. But, Nunn assured me after the debate, he intends to stay the course.

He recoils from the suggestion that he's doing a Mansfield unilateral-withdrawal isolationist thing: "His goal was to get us out. Mine is to keep us in"—by furnishing the Europeans with a sharper incentive for self-help and, specifically, by offering a program that raises the nuclear threshold and thus lets European politicians satisfy their publics' passion against the very idea of nuclear war.

Nunn sees a terrible disparity between our exposure and our security and he has a fair, hardheaded way to try to close a good part of the gap. The Europeans are fluttering. They should see the immense advantage to them of having the American handle on NATO be grasped by a conservative such as Nunn, who believes in a strong defense and in the Atlantic alliance, too.●

QUESTIONNAIRE RESULTS

HON. ROBERT E. WISE, JR.

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of my colleagues in the House of Representatives, I want to share the results of my 1984 opinion poll, which dealt with the problems of the Federal deficit primarily, and acid rain, secondarily.

Many respondents attached paragraphs to their questionnaires describing their concerns about the problems of our society and our Government. Chief among those concerns was money lost through Government waste. Overspending for parts by the military was a particularly frequent complaint in this category. Another concern was for the decay of the moral fiber of America. Next in frequency was a call for Government to regulate utility companies more closely, both to slow the rise of rates and to set and enforce controls on emissions into the air and water. Many respondents especially concerned about the deficit urged Congress to institute a budget freeze, or a pay-as-you-go budget, or some other control on spending. Many wrote to protest the amount of aid going overseas, at a time when America must tighten her belt. And finally, a question was frequently raised as to whether this questionnaire would actually be read and considered, and whether our Government really listens to its people. I, for one, intend to pay great heed to this questionnaire, and I urge my colleagues to do likewise.

I was especially pleased by the large number of my constituents who took the time and money to complete and mail back this poll. Their understanding of and concern for the issues raised, reflected by the enclosed comments as well as by the questionnaire itself, has been a pleasant surprise to me. Below is the text of my 1984 opinion poll, together with the results of those who responded.

1. If Congress must act to reduce the budget deficit, estimated at $180 billion this year, which one option do you favor?

30.6%—Reduce military spending.

24.3%—Freeze spending on all federal programs.

20.7%—Reduce non-military spending.

17.1%—Combine any tax increase with equal cuts in spending.

7.3%—Raise taxes.

2. In which areas, if any, should spending be cut?

43.6%—Foreign aid.

27.5%—Subsidies for nuclear energy, tobacco, milk, etc.

19.8%—Defense.

6.6%—Payments to individuals (Social Security, medicare, veterans benefits, food stamps).

2.5%—No further cuts should be made.

3. Where should we raise taxes, if at all?

50.2%—Close tax loopholes.

17.2%—We should not enact any new taxes.

13.3%—Tax imported oil.

9.4%—Enact a national sales tax.

3.0%—Raise personal income taxes.

6.9%—A combination of all of the above.

4. The cost of printing and postage for this report-questionnaire is 9.5¢ per household in the Third District. Is it a good use of our tax dollars to occasionally distribute reports such as this?

90.4%—Yes.

9.6%—No.

5. What is the most significant problem facing America today?

38.9%—Unemployment.

30.3%—Budget deficits.

12.8%—Interest rates.

8.0%—Inflation.

6.2%—The threat of war.

3.8%—All of the above equal.

6. Congress likely will be considering acid rain legislation in the near future. Which of the following statements most nearly reflects your views on acid rain?

40.8%—Acid rain is a problem, but I believe Congress should find ways to reduce sulfur emissions without eliminating coal mining jobs.

20.8%—The cost of administering an acid rain cleanup program should be shared by at least the 48 continental states.

15.6%—Acid rain is a problem, but I think we need more study before Congress acts.

2.7%—Acid rain is not a serious problem. We shouldn't do anything.

20.9%—I don't have enough information to form an opinion on this subject.●

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT OF 1934

HON. ALBERT GORE, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago this month the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934 was signed into law. This landmark legislation signaled a new direction in American trade policy, away from high tariffs and economic isolationism toward greater commercial cooperation with other nations. The act, whose basic principles of reciprocity and nondiscrimination remain the core of U.S. trade policy, sparked the drive for a more open world trading system and made possible the tremendous economic growth the United States has enjoyed since World War II.

In noting this anniversary, I take special pleasure in paying tribute to Cordell Hull, the architect of the 1934 act, for his lifelong fight to promote peace and prosperity through trade. A long-time resident of my hometown of Carthage, TN, Mr. Hull for over 20 years represented in this body the district I have been privileged to serve, and later represented the State of Tennessee in the U.S. Senate. In 1933 he was appointed Secretary of State and remained in that position for nearly 12 years, longer than any person in history, until illness forced him to resign in late 1944.

Cordell Hull was one of the giants of this century, a man of vision and unquestioned integrity whose accomplishments during his career continue to influence our Nation. As a Congressman he helped shape our country's economic structure through the 16th amendment and the progressive income tax law he wrote. As Secretary of State he fostered Western Hemispheric solidarity in the crucial prewar years through the Good Neighbor Policy. And, of course, he won worldwide acclaim, and the Nobel Prize, for his role in establishing the United Nations. Of all his achievements, however, none was more important or satisfying to him than winning approval from Congress in 1934 for the reciprocal trade program.

Cordell Hull's fight against trade barriers began with his maiden speech in Congress in 1908, when he spoke out against high tariffs and the domestic monopolies they spawned. From then until 1934 he never ceased urging a less restrictive trade policy. He saw foreign trade as essential to national prosperity, and realized other countries would have no money to buy our products unless they had opportunities to sell to us.

World War I and the economic chaos that followed convinced Mr. Hull that freer trade—freer in the sense of fewer discriminations and obstructions—offered the best hope for international stability. From then on, he wrote in his memoirs, "unhampered trade dovetailed with peace; high tariffs, trade barriers and unfair economic competition with war." The crippling effect of successive tariff hikes by the United States and other countries during this period bore out his views. After the Smoot-Hawley Act raised tariffs to an average 60 percent in 1930, U.S. exports dropped by two-thirds while our GNP fell to one-half what it was before the tariff increase.

Cordell Hull never claimed the trade agreements program would be an absolute panacea against war. As we know, another war did occur only a few years after passage of the 1934 act. It is a fact, however, that the United States did not go to war with any of the countries with which it had signed trade agreements, and with few exceptions the political lineup in World War II followed the economic lineup. Having the benefit of hindsight, one can't help wondering whether events in the interwar period might have been different if Mr. Hull's reciprocal trade policy had been adopted when he first proposed it at the close of World War I.

Mr. Speaker, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was the first of several steps over the past 50 years to improve the world trading system. Much has been accomplished yet there is still much to be done. Tariff walls have largely been dismantled but there are other, often hidden, barriers that continue to obstruct trade. American companies face more competition from foreign producers, and there are new challenges such as trade in services and high technology that have yet to be taken up. As we continue the task begun half a century ago, I hope we will prove as sage in our time as Cordell Hull was in his.●

NATIONAL NEIGHBORHOOD HOUSING SERVICES WEEK

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I thank and commend my colleagues who joined as cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 566 designating the week of October 7, 1984, as "National Neighborhood Housing Services Week." This resolution commemorates the largest neighborhood-based network of public-private partnerships at work in our country.

From San Diego to Tacoma, from Dallas to Green Bay, from south Portland to Miami; Neighborhood Housing Services [NHS] programs are at work rebuilding nearly 200 neighborhoods, turning them into sound healthy places in which to live and do business for the benefit of almost 2 million people.

I have known this program for over 10 years both here and in California where they have had a track record of success which is most impressive. Both in direct and indirect ways, NHS programs have saved hundreds of neighborhoods and stimulated about $2.4 billion of reinvestment in areas which previously had been written off as unsafe and undesirable. Through NHS's work, homes in these neighborhoods have been repaired, modernized and painted; business districts have been revitalized; vacant lots have sprouted the first new construction in more than a generation and blighted properties have been converted into comfortable homes. In addition to the almost 200 neighborhoods currently receiving NHS services, 10 neighborhoods have reached a level of self-reliance and virtually turned themselves into "neighborhoods of choice."

It is important, Mr. Speaker, to understand that at the heart of each of these programs is a NHS Board of Directors composed of residents, business leaders and local government officials. Over the years, these NHS partners have contributed resources that build vibrant communities: Time and hard work; credibility with neighbors; loans and other business services; financial contributions, city services and capital improvements. Traditionally, these programs' operations have been supported by contributions from savings and loan, banking and insurance institutions. Their contributions to NHS, both through support for NHS operating budgets and to the secondary market for rehabilitation loans for the NHS nonbankable client, have been critical to the ability of each NHS to carry out its mission. Today, in order for Neighborhood Housing Services programs to expand their services, broader corporate sector awareness of and support for their work is essential. The national NHS network is reaching out to the corporate community for support. The private sector leaders of this country which have lined up to help the NHS network in responding to this challenge are to be honored and commended.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my colleagues for joining me in recognizing the effort and contributions made by NHS volunteers, business and community leaders to revitalizing America's neighborhoods—a priceless national resource. I am certain that the "National Neighborhood Housing Services Week" will strengthen the efforts of all those involved with NHS programs and will help to increase awareness and support for NHS's work.●

TRIBUTE TO THE MOUNT HEALTHY HIGH SCHOOL BAND

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, as the Representative of the First Congressional District of Ohio I would like to congratulate the Mount Healthy High School Band on their selection as the first high school band ever to be invited, much less tour, the People's Republic of China.

Since its inception the Mount Healthy High School Band has set a standard of excellence in concert performance. Under the capable and dedicated direction of Mr. Russel Hinkle the band has in fact traveled abroad once every 3 years for the past 23 years. Each of these trips have been funded by the band students themselves.

It comes as no surprise then, that this band was chosen by the Friendship Ambassador Foundation as the first high school band ever to tour the People's Republic of China. The exemplary conduct of these students, musicians, and citizens on past tours has earned them this honor. This Foundation carefully screened many top bands before selecting Mount Healthy and I can say without reserve that this event brings honor not only to the members of the band, their parents and the band boosters who worked so hard to make this happen, but to the community and the country as well.

MOUNT HEALTHY BAND MEMBERS

Seniors: Bette Davis, Lori Dorn, Jerry Hall, David Hatfield, Laina Libby, Greg Peter, Beth Rankin, Angie Robinson, Gail Smith, Bill Summe, Sherie Tucker, Marcie Witte, and Jill Poore.

THE POLICE CORPS ASSISTANCE ACT

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I commend to my colleagues an editorial in the Fall River Herald News supporting the concept embodied in the Police Corps. The Police Corps idea is gaining strength throughout the country, particularly in States such as Massachusetts, New York, and California. Essentially, the Police Corps program would provide competitively achieved scholarships to college students who agree to serve 3 years following graduation as full-fledged police officers in State or local police forces.

I have filed legislation, H.R. 5838, to grant Federal support to the State and local Police Corps in order to get this imaginative idea off the ground. I believe that the influx of highly qualified individuals into our police forces resulting from Police Corps programs would be an effective way to fight rising crime in many of our communities. Beyond this primary goal of the program, there are ancillary benefits outlined in the Herald News editorial that follows:

POLICE CORPS

Public service is never out of date, and when public service can be combined with receiving a college education, it should be extemely attractive to a great many young people.

This is the essential point of what is being called the "Police Corps".

The notion is to train students as police officers during their summer vacations in a fashion similar to the ROTC, and in return for their room, board and college tuition, the trainees after graduation will perform a three year tour of duty with the police.

Certainly it is true here as well as everywhere else that there never seem to be enough trained police officers.

Furthermore, as the demands on police departments become more complex, the more education the police have the better.

Police officers are essential public servants, and not enough young people realize just how vital these dedicated men and women are.

The promoters of the "Police Corps" hope that experience of police training and work will persuade a considerable number of the corps members to make it their profession.

This has been true of the ROTC. Many reserve officers stay with the Army permanently.

There is no reason why it should not be true to the "Police Corps" trainees as well.

One reason why several states, including Massachusetts, are considering setting the idea is that training a police officer in this fashion is relatively inexpensive.

In New York City, for instance, training a police officer costs $50,000. It is estimated that a "Police Corps" trainee would cost New York State about $20,000, or $8,000 a year.

The saving is too considerable to be ignored, although it should be pointed out that police unions have not been enthusiastic about the whole idea.

Much needs to be worked out about the practical applications of the plan, but essentially it seems to be reasonable way of recruiting able young people for a form of public service that is frequently neglected or underestimated.

More often than not, young men and women think of public service in terms of far-off places and more or less primitive surroundings.

By contrast, the "Police Corps" associates public service with familiar places and with the protection of the way of life that young people have always enjoyed.

It may not have occurred to them that their way of life needs protection, but if the "Police Corps" puts this notion in their minds, then so much the better.

The trainees in any future "Police Corps" will find that much the greater part of their work is helping out people in all kinds of trouble.

Some of the troubles may be trivial, others may well be matters of life or death.

But over and above the more romantic aspects of police work, a trainee will find that his or her job is mostly being of service to people that need help. He or she may well find that this is rewarding work for a lifetime.

Governor Dukakis has been weighing whether or not to support the notion here in Massachusetts.

It already has the backing of Senator Edward M. Kennedy and Representative Barney Frank.

There are many details in terms of implementing the plan that need further study, but basically, the "Police Corps" seems like an idea that can and should work.●

TRIBUTE TO TARAS SHEVCHENKO

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, 1984 marks a very important anniversary for all Ukrainian-Americans in the United States. Twenty years ago a statue was erected here in Washington to honor the Ukrainian poet, Taras Shevchenko.

Shevchenko, who died in 1861, was a bold and vigilant voice for freedom in his lifetime, despite repeated attempts by the authorities of czarist Russia to suppress his writings; 20 years ago, some 100,000 Ukrainian-Americans came to Washington to remember this national hero.

In memory of Shevchenko, and to commemorate the 20th anniversary of the erection of the poet's statue, I would like to include in my statement a letter from Walter Stadnicki, an active member in both the Ukrainian community in my district and in Amnesty International. The letter was first printed in the New Haven Register. I would also like to share with my colleagues one of the poet's own works.

March is the month of Taras Shevchenko, Ukraine's immortal poet and bard who was born and died in the month of March after a life-span of 47 years—most of them spent in Czarist serfdom, captivity in hard labor camps and exile.

He paid heavily in Czarist Russia, as many Ukrainian prisoners of conscience are presently doing in the Gulag, for his poetic creativeness and political ideals.

He was an ardent fighter for freedom of his people and for the realization of the ideas of universal brotherhood and liberty. To Shevchenko, Ukraine was more than a geographical reality. It was above all an incredibly lovely vision of all that is good and worthwhile in human nature.

A statue in honor of Ukraine's poet laureate was erected in Washington, D.C., in June 1964 in close proximity to the Church of Pilgrims.

The very sacred ideas of Shevchenko have been maligned and distorted beyond recognition by the Soviet authorities—a land where freedom of the press, speech, worship, and the right to express one's opinion without fear is only a dream.

"O My Thoughts, My Heartfelt Thoughts"

(By Taras Shevchenko (1839))

There is Ukraina;
From end to end, there, it is broad
And joyful like freedom
Which has long since passed away;
Broad as a sea, the Dnipro,
Steppe and steppe, the rapids roar,
And gravemounds high as mountains.
There was born the Lozak, freedom,
There she galloped round,
With Tartars and with Polish lords
She strewed the plain about
Till it could take no more; with corpses
All the plain she strewed.
Freedom lay down to take her rest;
And high above it, as a warder,
Hovers the Black Eagle,
And minstrels come and sing about
The gravemound to the people.●

THE FUTURE OF DEMOCRACY

HON. RICHARD RAY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, recently, Doug Taylor of Americus visited Washington to take part in activities sponsored by the Washington Workshops Foundation. As a student at Southland Academy in Americus, Doug wrote an essay on the future of democracy, which I would like to commend to the attention of my colleagues:

WHAT IS THE FUTURE OF DEMOCRACY IN THE WORLD TODAY?

"Twenty killed! Government overthrown in Nigeria! Today, the military assumed control of all governmental operations in Nigeria after a supposedly bloodless coup. Military ruler Major General Mohammed Buhari cited rampant corruption and grave economic conditions as reasons for the overthrow of deposed President Shehu Shagari's administration," blared the evening news broadcaster. Once again, in a world already filled with communistic and dictatorial regimes, a free, elected government has fallen. Indeed, the downfall of democratic societies or, at the very least, the oppression of its people, has become a frighteningly frequent occurrence. What does the future hold for democracy? Apparently, if present trends continue, the future of democracy is a bleak one. However, there is always hope; and as long as there is a will to overcome the evil of those who advocate suppressionistic governments, there is a means available to succeed.

From the very beginning of society to the modern day, there have been constant upheavals and wars waged over people and their right to sovereignty. The right to govern oneself is perhaps the most fundamental and, at the same time, the greatest freedom which a people can possess. It also, perhaps, is the most frequently denied. It is those who attempt to impose and impress upon others their particular ideology who threaten free societies. Their hunger for power and for world domination blinds them to the needs and desires of the people. Moreover, they simply refuse to be receptive to the pleas of those who long to be free. For example, the now outlawed Solidarity Union of Poland waged a valiant struggle to establish some semblance of political freedom in 1980. In early 1981, marshal law was declared in Poland, and Solidarity, along with the limited political freedom that it had gained, was banned. The efforts of those suppressed people, however, continue to provide an impetus to the remaining peoples of the world to fight for their God-given right.

For many people, democracy is "such stuff as dreams are made on;" sadly, for many, a fleeting dream is all democracy will ever be. Although the mood heretofore has been grim, there is reason for hope; for the world is not entirely devoid of freedom. In fact, the United States, Great Britain, Canada, Japan, and West Germany—the greatest nations in the world—are of a democratic mind. It is in these nations, and others like them, that freedom is considered the most basic human right. The time is now for the great nations of the world to assert themselves and to be heard above the clamor of the propaganda machines. Democracy seems the natural order of government—no one man more powerful in voice than any other; the form of government which our forefathers intended for us, the inhabitants of this world, to utilize. We must unite in order to fend off the continuous barrage of subversive activities which the imperialistic nations of the world aim at us. Collectively, the democracies of the world represent quite a powerful force—one with which to be reckoned. It is with this thought that faith can be placed in the future of this tumultuous world—that in the end, democracy will prevail, and all people will have the right to determine their own destiny and to seek their own fate. What a world it would be!

Democracy—a hope? a dream? an aspiration? It is a true form of government, for the people, by the people, of the people. With the desires of the many peoples as the army and with time as an ally, democracy is the reality of the future.●

THE BATTLE AGAINST TERRORISM

HON. JOHN P. EAST

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. EAST. Mr. President, I should like to make note of the last in a series of highly informative articles in the Washington Times on the subject of terrorism. These articles have shed a great deal of light on the terrorist threat, the shadow of which looms over our Nation. As a member of the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, I am heartened that national attention is being drawn to the problem of terrorism and the challenge that it presents to this Nation's institutions.

My distinguished colleague, Senator JEREMIAH DENTON, in his capacity as chairman of the Security and Terrorism Subcommittee deserves the lion's share of the credit for awakening this Nation to the terrorist threat. Senator DENTON's accomplishments in exposing terrorist activity and offering constuctive legislation to combat it are cited repeatedly throughout this series of articles. Leading law enforcement officials and experts in this field also have praised Senator DENTON's great effort.

Senator DENTON's personal struggle with the horrors of Communist terror, has given him unique insight into the danger it poses to individual liberty. He has used this insight to direct his subcommittee through exhaustive investigations into the sources, character, and consequences of international terrorism. Moreover, he has developed his subcommittee into a legislative catalyst for combating terrorism.

It has been a privilege to work with Senator DENTON's effort against terrorism. I believe that America owes a debt of gratitude to Senator DENTON for his lasting contribution to the peace and security of our Nation.

Mr. President, I ask to have the June 29, 1984, installment of the Washington Times series on terrorism printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

TERRORISM IN THE U.S.A.

(By Ted Agres)

In the war against terrorism, many experts believe that stronger legislation is an important weapon.

Others say that it's just the first of a number of steps that should be taken if the growing terrorist threat is to be brought under control.

"Certainly the administration is prepared to try to deal with the problem [of terrorism] and the legislation that has gone forward represents our best judgment about what else to do," says U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Jeane Kirkpatrick.

Legislation, says Sen. Jeremiah Denton, R-Ala., chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, can "fill a hiatus" and help to combat terrorism in this country and abroad. He held a series of hearings earlier this month on legislation to strengthen reprisals against terrorism.

"Terrorism statistics have not signaled alarm in the U.S. because the Soviets have not chosen to use this tactic at this time," Mr. Denton says. "This does not foreclose the possibility that such acts will increase."

Some of the proposed legislation is simply geared to correcting glaring gaps. These include, for example, passing enabling legislation for bills that already have received the go-ahead from lawmakers but have been languishing in a congressional twilight zone.

Two of the four administration-backed bills submitted in April fit this category.

The first bill relates to a United Nations convention on hostage-taking signed by President Reagan in 1981. It allows for federal jurisdiction in any kidnapping case when a threat is made to kill or injure a person unless a third party does or abstains from doing something. The bill would simply implement this act as part of domestic law.

The second bill fills a technical gap in legislation already passed relating to airline hijackings or aircraft sabotage. It was signed by the United States in Montreal in 1971 but, again, had lacked domestic implementation.

The third bill would allow the federal government to pay rewards up to $500,000 for the arrest or conviction of terrorists or for information leading to prevention of a terrorist act.

The fourth bill, the most controversial, would prohibit the "training, supporting or inducing of terrorism" and would set penalties of at least $100,000 and/or up to 10 years in jail for each offense.

The broadly worded bill would prohibit any U.S. citizen or resident alien from providing "training . . . logistical, mechanical, maintenance, or similar support services . . . to any foreign government, faction, or international terrorist group" anywhere in the world.

What is disturbing to many—including conservatives such as Mr. Denton and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah—is that the bill authorizes the secretary of state to unilaterally designate which foreign group or governments are "terrorist." And those prosecuted under the bill would not be allowed to challenge this designation.

Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, is disturbed by the bill, which he thinks is a "throwback to the McCarthy era," because it does not define what "support" or "terrorism" means or allow anyone to challenge the government's designation of being a terrorist.

Administration officials testifying before the Denton subcommittee indicated that they would not be adverse to working with Congress on defining what constitutes terrorism. But one Senate source said this bill already "is dead in the water."

Robert Kupperman, a terrorism expert at Georgetown's Center for Strategic and International Studies, has wry words for the administration's proposals. He calls the rewards bill akin to "a new format of national lottery" in which people may start turning in friends and neighbors in hopes "that one of them might turn out to be a terrorist."

The administration itself recognizes that lawmaking is not a panacea. "The legislation before the Congress will not fill all those gaps," says Secretary of State George Shultz. "But it will fill some of them."

Other bills to clamp down on terrorism have been in the works for some time. Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan, D-N.Y., introduced a bill several months ago similar to the rewards bill. It would authorize up to $10 million each year to be granted for information that thwarts or resolves a terrorist act.

Mr. Denton has introduced several pieces of legislation on his own. One would allow operators of nuclear power plants access to FBI files to do background checks on employees having access to nuclear facilities or material.

Nuclear plant operators have generally supported the proposal, arguing that, while the power plant itself is not a security issue, access to nuclear material is because it is such an inviting commodity for terrorists.

Another of Mr. Denton's bills which has met with some opposition, would make terrorism a federal offense and grant the FBI authority in all such investigations. At present, terrorism per se is not a crime; it is only the acts of terrorism that fall under one or more criminal activity statutes, many of which are not federal offenses.

This has led to problems, especially when a state or local agency has jurisdiction and wants to handle an incident on its own, despite the FBI's concomitant jurisdiction.

The Los Angeles Police Department and the FBI, for example, recently had to work out an agreement settling the "turf" problem at the Olympics. Mr. Denton's bill would eliminate such jurisdictional problems by specifying the FBI as the "lead" agency.

Sources said, however, that Mr. Denton would not offer the bill up for consideration until after the November elections. The problem, the source said, is that the bill does not define what constitutes "terrorism," and could be applied in different ways by different administrations.

Many experts agree that there are limits to how effectively legislation can address the problem of terrorism. The suicide bombings—like the attack against the U.S. Marine headquarters in Beirut last year, killing more than 260—pose a particularly difficult challenge.

"I don't know how we're going to deal with it," says Ray Wannall, former assistant FBI director in charge of intelligence. "No legislation is going to stop a terrorist as long as he is willing to give up his life."

Assistant FBI Director Oliver "Buck" Revell warns that "[legislation] won't turn the tide. We have the capability to contain terrorism, not eliminate it." ●

TRIBUTE TO HOMESTAKE MINING CO.

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend Homestake Mining Co.'s enlightened approach to the development of the McLaughlin mining project in northern California.

Homestake is to be commended for coordinating its plans to develop the mine with every faction of the affected communities, both in the immediate area and downstream.

Homestake has gone beyond complying with the letter of the law; it has sought to comply with the law's spirit as well. Homestake Mining has been sensitive to the concerns of local environmentalists and shown a true commitment and understanding of the values of conservation.

As demonstrated by a recent letter to the Yolo County Planning Commission written by the chairman of the Yolano Group of the Mother Lode Chapter of the Sierra Club, environmentalists have also recognized Homestake's dedication and commitment to ensuring that the McLaughlin mine is built and operated in the most environmentally safe manner possible. Wrote Ada Merhoff, the conservation chair of the Yolano Group:

We would be remiss if we did not publicly state our feeling that Homestake Mining Co. is to be commended for its willingness to accommodate the particular concerns of the interested public, and for its efforts to establish an environmentally sound mining operation here. Such cooperation from a large mining company is noteworthy and deserves due credit.

Homestake is an example of the right way to develop mining property. It is an example of the kind of cooperation and responsiveness that I hope will serve as standard for companies pursuing similar endeavors elsewhere in the future.●

SUBMINIMUM WAGE—JOBS FOR KIDS OR RIPOFF FOR BUSINESS?

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, in the guise of helping unemployed youth find jobs in an increasingly competitive and complex job market, the administration has proposed cutting wages for youth 25 percent, a proposal which would increase only marginally, if at all, the overall number of jobs available and would result in enormous windfall profits for low-wage businesses taking advantage of the opportunity to cut their payroll costs.

The administration's proposal would undercut the basic principal of equal pay for equal work by paying youth aged 16 to 19 $2.50 per hour rather than the standard minimum wage of $3.35 per hour. The proposal would violate the basic purpose of the Fair Labor Standards Act which establishes a minimum wage floor for all workers; instead, employers would be free to discriminate on the basis of age and exploit younger workers.

For industries which typically hire low-skilled, low-wage workers, the proposal presents an unprecedented windfall. The fast food industry alone could potentially reap billions in payroll savings—up to $5 billion over the life of the administration's proposal. This represents just the tip of the iceberg as far as potential gains for employers. Other industries, such as apparel, and retail and service establishments would experience similar gains. These windfall gains would not be targeted to shore up struggling firms. Wendy's, for example, experienced a growth in profits of 735 percent between 1976 and 1983; McDonalds' profits increased 214 percent.

The administration claims that its proposal would prohibit the substitution of youth for adult workers. In practice, however, the safeguards contained in the Fair Labor Standards Act are flagrantly violated, and enforcement by the Department of Labor is pathetically inadequate. Moreover, the real question is not the displacement of existing adult workers, but who gets the job in the first place—a 20-year-old worker at $3.35 per hour or a 19-year-old at $2.50 per hour. Few employers would pass up such an opportunity to reduce costs and increase profits.

If we really want to do something about the youth employment problem, let us provide opportunities which will result in a net increase in available jobs, target asssistance to those in greatest need, and increase their skills so they will be competitive in the labor market. McDonalds doesn't need a bailout.●

MAJ. GEN. DONALD RAY MORELLI

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, our Nation suffered a great loss on Wednesday with the death of Maj. Gen. Donald Ray Morelli, Deputy Chief of Staff for Doctrine at the U.S. Army Training and Doctrine Command. General Morelli had a distinguished 28-year career in the U.S. Army. He was a graduate of West Point, the University of Illinois, and Cornell University. He earned many military awards and decorations. He held many important staff and command assignments in the United States, Europe, and Asia.

Yet, it is for reasons beyond these that Gen. Don Morelli will be missed and remembered. As a thinker, motivator, and innovator he was without peer among those who serve in our military. He was the father of the air/land battle doctrine which serves as the basis for U.S. Army strategy now, and will serve as the fundamental building block for U.S. Army strategy into the next century. A little over 6 months ago, I had the unique experience of being briefed on these concepts by General Morelli himself. Even though he was ill at that time, his brilliance and his passionate commitment to his ideas was evident. After this briefing, I could only conclude that I had been in the presence of greatness.

Gen. Donald Morelli has been taken from us at the peak of his career, but his memory and his ideas will live on. Our Nation is stronger and better prepared today because he served us.●

WOMEN IN LEADERSHIP

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, the Ninth Annual Women in Leadership luncheon was held on April 6, 1984, in New Haven, CT. Sponsored by the YWCA of Greater New Haven, the luncheon honored women leaders in the area who have made a great impact on society, through their many accomplishments and their example for future women leaders.

Julia M. McNamara, O.P., president of Albertus Magnus College in New Haven, was guest honoree speaker at the Leadership luncheon. Julia McNamara, who plays a vital part in the New Haven community, provides a clear role model both for Albertus Magnus students and for all women with whom she comes in contact. I am pleased today to share President McNamara's remarks with my colleagues.

Today we really celebrate the women of the city of New Haven and the YW. That winning organization which says so much to all of us about breaking down barriers and getting on with the promotion of women's actual leadership. So often, today, we hear people say: What do women want? (Perhaps we even say it about other women). Today's gathering, and the Y's philosophy which supports us, indicates that women want simply, justice, fairness and appropriate recognition for leadership, given or earned. They want it for themselves and for others. Self-confident, serious women want to assure that such justice will be part of the fabric of life here in our little corner of Connecticut. The fact is that most women today want the whole hamburger—not just "the beef" or the "bun" either for that matter. Incidentally, just who are those 3 rasping little ladies in the now famous Wendy's commercial? Are they us? I think not. They are raggedy, stereotyped caricatures of us, as we never want to be. We can't be fooled into thinking that they won their case—they don't even get a response to their push-tone phone call. You who are here today are a much better measure of who American women continue to become. You are self-confident, disciplined persons who consistently make the contribution, large or small, noticeable or not, to increasing the visibility, prominence and participation of all women in our world.

A basic question for all of us here is how do we educate for leadership. We may have achieved it in our various situations, but now we have to be about giving other women the tools for leadership, by our example, by our self-confidence, by our personal freedom from guilt and fears which some might foist upon us.

Leadership is never a static component of human experience. It is a dynamic, dramatic interruption into ordinary living of commitment, passion and desire. It's up to all of us to see that women have the opportunity to surface their abilities and strengthen their commitment to become leaders. People catch on to leadership styles: Leadership is not taught so much as caught. There's a subtle raising of consciousness when we see somebody else doing what we'd like to be doing. All of us have known it and have become admirers. Some have become even imitators of various styles. Mostly, we learn to participate through the observation of others' contributions. A long time ago now, the generosity and selflessness of some magnificent yet very human women made me become part of an organization which would, I vaguely thought, help me to channel energy to become an educator and to work with others. Certainly, that journey has taken many different, unexpected turns and probably will continue to do so; but the fact is that without the example of committed women, I would never have made an initial life-choice (which helps me to make a small contribution toward developing leadership in others). And, you know, to have seen women running large organizations in the context of the Roman Catholic Church, which I love, but which is really one of the last great patriarchies on Earth (not to remain so forever, I am sure)—that was no small feat. In fact, the inroads which contemporary women are making in the church make me think that there is even hope for the Knights of St. Patrick's St. Patrick's Day stag dinner here in New Haven! Do we ever stop and think now much we affect other women's choices? Then do we take care not to smother proteges, but allow them to go free of us and exceed us, urging them to trace new paths and create new styles and patterns. How unfortunate if we who have chosen freedom for ourselves did not also allow our successors their freedom.

And, of course, young women need to know, by our example, that there are many styles and forms of leadership. What is given to one is not given to all. "There are gifts and gifts . . ." The scriptures tell us. But in any area, I believe that the basis of true leadership springs up from one's deepest conviction about an issue or a cause. Without deep-down conviction, one cannot lead; one can manage, perhaps, but not lead. Once in a while in my job (the description of which includes everything but the statement "she shall walk on water") I'm tempted to retreat into the soporific realm of detachment and become distanced from something. (You know, when you close your eyes and say "I can't stand it"). Gradually, I've come to see that such non-participation and separation from reality yields stagnation and does nothing for anybody. And the first ones to observe such behavior are the very people for whom we should be examples of participation and presence. Let us never underestimate the power of example in educating for leadership. (All of us make mistakes. That's the human condition, but it's important to admit our frailties and foibles quickly and get on with the work).

Education for leadership demands that we allow other women to gain self-confidence by providing opportunities for positive work experience so that their sensibilities will not be dulled, at least immediately, by sexism or disdain in whatever workplace. One measure of a person's self-confidence lies in the way she or he can accept others, all of the others, and can "love the differences", as the poet Rilke says. To overcome barriers established by years and years of formal or casual, blatant or tacit sexism requires that young women develop their skills and talents in a workplace or study place where collaboration and cooperation are considered important. For this to occur, there have to be more examples of sensitive women and men in positions of real leadership in organizations. If a young woman has never known another woman in a position of leadership, how is she going to assume that she can do it, too? To allow women to become leaders requires selflessness on the part of other women and men. Now, then this is the only way that the transformation of society into a truly sexually-integrated whole is going to occur. I know a Wall Street banker who is a senior vice president of a major New York bank. His boss is a woman which for that level in New York is still unfortunately startling. But the wonderful thing is that this man speaks so highly of her, respects her marvelous ability, and appreciates the differences in their way of looking at things. The people who are luckiest in this little scenario are his three daughters who are growing up knowing that their father literally works for a woman, likes it, and considers it normal. (Let me tell you that the man is my brother-in-law. If I'd started out saying "A woman is his boss", some might have assumed that I meant my sister! The point is that he admires her leadership and promotes it. Women today need men to support their leadership. We have to have women and men around who believe that there is something lacking in a society where equality of the sexes does not prevail. Education for leadership, then, requires that young men and boys, your sons, brothers, co-workers be educated to take women seriously if they don't already (or at least as seriously as they take other men). If a young man has never known what it's like to have a woman in authority, how on Earth will he ever consider voting for one to be Vice-President of the United States? (You'll notice that my example is a modest one).

Boys should grow up expecting that women will also be leaders. Educating for women's leadership can't just include women. The wonderful opposite sex must become a firmer part of the drive to include women in leadership, indeed to make women's participation ordinary, not extraordinary. After all, if we really believe in educating women for leadership, we shall recognize that this is not just a women's issue, rather it is a human issue. I've been learning this the hard way. When I first became president, I used to say "If a woman doesn't do it, it doesn't get done at Albertus." Within the next ten months, I'd hired 3 men in key positions. Students began to object, quoting back at me, "if a woman, etc. . . ." I realized that influencing students to reverse sexism was not so great either!

The ideal is to stress our society's necessary transformation so that leadership will be exercised effectively by women and by men. Then a woman won't be told that she's a fine leader because she "thinks like man." Rather, because she thinks like a feminine, human being. Then there will be no sexual discrimination in any corner of our society and there will be acceptance even "love of the differences" and of the abilities. Not until the new Jerusalem will such a thing occur, a reverie, you say? Yes, perhaps for now, but in the meantime we must continue to educate for women's leadership. For education is a principal avenue to true liberation for all of us. As today's honorees and this gathering demonstrate, leadership is both a right and a duty for women.

In order that tomorrow's and next year's leaders advance beyond us, we must always be educating ourselves and them in the skills of leadership so that humanism, not sexism can prevail in this land and on our fragile Earth. So that we shall get beyond the agenda which sexism necessarily imposes on us and work together, humanly, masculine and feminine voices together, on the overwhelming agenda which the threat of nuclear war and the reality of wretched poverty impose upon our humanity and our Earth.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, June 21 and Friday, June 22, I was reviewing units of the Tennessee National Guard at Camp Shelby, MS, and, therefore, missed votes on two rules. Had I been present I would have voted "aye" on Rollcall No. 260 providing an open rule for the consideration of H.R. 5490, the Civil Rights Act of 1984, and "aye" on Rollcall No. 263, providing an open rule for the consideration of H.R. 5680, the Federal Pay Equity Act.●

A GENEROUS VOLUNTEER

HON. BILL EMERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is not often we have the opportunity afforded us to see the true spirit of America in working motion. But, I am proud today to say that such a spirit is alive and well, and working hard to help reinforce those things which are genuinely American.

My home district in southeastern Missouri is proud of its Veterans' Administration Medical Center, and the service it provides to thousands of area veterans and their families. And today, we are especially proud of one woman who has given so much of herself through the years to help fulfill the mission of the facility. Since the Poplar Bluff, MO, Veterans' Administration Medical Center opened its doors in 1951, Mrs. Lucille Clifton of Poplar Bluff has been there. And since that time, she has given 20,000 hours of volunteer service to the facility, and to the veterans and their families at the center.

Mrs. Clifton works each week helping out wherever she can—in answering letters to preparing charity baskets to serving coffee and helping out with the weekly bingo game. In a recent newspaper interview Mrs. Clifton said, "I just love the work and the people. I've never been 1 minute discouraged in my work—and I'm proud of it."

The people of Poplar Bluff and southeast Missouri are proud of Mrs. Clifton. Recently, Mrs. Clifton was awarded the prestigious Jefferson Award for her dedication, hard work, and undaunted spirit.

In my opinion, Mrs. Clifton epitomizes what being a good citizen should be—serving others without thought of self-recognition. And what other calling can be as great as the serving of those who have served this Nation in a time of national need. Mrs. Clifton is an obvious believer in American volunteerism—and believes everyone should try their hand at giving a little in volunteer time. "I think we have too many people sitting around doing nothing when they could be happy doing something for somebody else," she said. Mrs. Clifton has indeed lived by those words. May we all have such a spirit of unselfishness and a will to help others as she has all these years. These are the things that helped to shape the American spirit and make this Nation the shining beacon to the world that it is today.●

HARVEST OF FUR SEALS

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, each year the U.S. Government conducts a harvest of the North Pacific fur seals off the Pribiloff Islands of Alaska. The harvest is governed by a treaty between the United States, Canada, the U.S.S.R., and Japan known as the Interim Convention on the Conservation of the North Pacific Fur Seal. This October, the existing convention will expire; before this treaty is renewed, it is essential that the economic and environmental facts are clear.

This year's hunt of 22,000 seals will be carried out by the Aleuts according to the terms of the treaty. In payment for the hunt, the Aleuts will receive 32,000 pelts which are currently in storage warehouses and an additional $500,000. The cash payment was agreed upon because of the low demand for seal pelts on the fur market.

In addition, Senator TED STEVENS of Alaska has introduced into committee a supplemental appropriations bill which would provide $2.8 million for the Aleuts to upgrade utility systems on the island. In this bill, $800,000 is earmarked for funding the 1984 slaughter.

The contract, as well as STEVENS' Supplemental Appropriation bill, completely undermine the intent of Public Law 98-129 which provides for the orderly termination of Federal management of the Pribiloff Islands, AK. I supported the bill creating Public Law 98-129, and had an amendment adopted which limits taking of seals; $20 million was specifically granted to the Aleuts to aid in the transition from a sealing economy. This transition will not come about as long as we continue to fund and support the seal slaughter.

Currently, the seal herd is declining at 8 to 10 percent each year and will be reduced by 50 percent in 7 years. The fur seals have been reduced to one-third of their 1950's level. Under the Marine Mammal Protection Act, international treaties affecting marine mammals must be brought into compliance with the protective language of the act upon their renewal. By the terms of the MMPA, the seal population is declining to the level of "threatened species." We must have stronger protection for seals if the treaty is to be renewed.

Under the existing terms, renewal of the treaty would be absurd. There is insufficient demand at present for the 32,000 pelts in storage—why kill an additional 22,000? The seal harvest does not present viable economic prospects for the natives or any parties to the treaty. Third, the treaty is inconsistent with Public Law 98-129 which specifically aims to make the Aleuts less dependent on a seal market economy and on U.S. aid in future years. Finally the seal population is on a drastic decline and must be protected if we wish to see it survive as a species.●

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ILWU

HON. SALA BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, 1984 marks the 50th anniversary of the 1934 west coast waterfront and general strike which led to the forming of the International Longshoremen's Warehousemen's Union. The ILWU will celebrate this event on July 8, at San Francisco's Fort Mason center.

The purpose of this celebration, according to ILWU President James Herman, is to "pay homage to the men and women who, against enormous odds and in the face of terrible attacks, created the ILWU and ushered in a new era in west coast labor relations."

The 1934 strike marked the emergence of a distinctive west coast waterfront-oriented labor organization and a turning point in the history of organized labor, not only in the San Francisco Bay area, but across the Nation. The ILWU, while not formally put together until 1937, sprung from the violent days of the summer of 1934, when thousands of longshoremen, sailors, firemen, cooks and stewards, masters, mates, and marine engineers walked picket lines in every major Pacific Coast port.

On July 5, 1934, which has become known as Bloody Thursday, two striking workers were killed in San Francisco. From this point, public support swung to the workers and their efforts to organize. under the able leadership of their founder and first president, Harry Bridges, the ILWU made tremendous strides in improving the wages and working conditions of the dockworkers and became a leading force in the struggle for social justice. Under the leadership of their current president and my dear friend Jimmy Herman, the ILWU continues to be a progressive force for worker rights and protections.

I want to congratulate the ILWU on their 50th anniversary and wish them continued success in their next 50 years.●

FOOD FOR PEACE DAY

HON. DAN SCHAEFER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be a cosponsor and enthusiastically support House Joint Resolution 572, which, if adopted, would proclaim July 10, 1984, as "Food for Peace Day." Such a resolution would be a fitting tribute on this, the 30th anniversary of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Program.

President Eisenhower signed the act into law on July 10, 1954. Since the enactment of this law, over 300 million tons of agricultural commodities and products valued at $34 billion have been distributed to more than 150 countries under the program, substantially reducing world hunger and improving nutritional standards. In addition, this program has served as an example to other nations and encouraged them to help meet food needs abroad making available agricultural surpluses or cash donations for such purposes.

This program has an important humanitarian aspect. When disaster strikes, U.S. food aid is there to meet critical emergency needs. Being the largest food donor in the world, providing more nourishment to the world's hungry than all other nations combined, the United States will transport an estimated 6 million metric tons of 25 commodities to more than 80 nations.

American food aid has brought new hope and opportunity to millions of people around the world. I would like to quote Secretary of State George Shultz, when he said:

> In our world today, there can be no enduring economic prosperity for the United States without sustained economic growth in the Third World. Security and peace for Americans are contingent on stability and peace in the developing world.

For 30 years the Food for Peace Program has played a key role in meeting critical food needs, encouraging economic development, and providing jobs and benefits for millions of Americans, while increasing the market for U.S. goods and services abroad. In the most recent statistics available, my home State of Colorado exported in excess of $23 million alone in fiscal year 1982. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.●

U.S. POLICY ON TORTURE—HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 605

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, this week, 45 colleagues joined me in cosponsoring House Joint Resolution 605, regarding the implementation of the policy of the U.S. Government in opposition to the practice of torture by any foreign government. Senator PERCY has introduced an identical resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 320, in the Senate.

The resolution reaffirms the U.S. position opposing torture and sets forth guidelines to implement U.S. policy to combat that abusive practice. Torture, the most abhorrent of human rights violations, is regularly practiced in over 60 countries.

House Joint Resolution 605 is an initial step toward addressing the problem. The resolution delineates specific guidelines to help shape our policy toward combating the practice of torture around the world. The prescriptives set forth in the resolution should help sensitize governments and officials, both here and abroad, to the reprehensible use of torture. Further, the resolution underscores our commitment to the elimination of torture.

In view of Amnesty International's efforts to highlight awareness of this widespread and systematic abuse, and the hearings on torture conducted by the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, it is appropriate that we now enunciate U.S. policy on this serious issue. I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to the text of the resolution, which follows, and encourage all Members of the House to join me in cosponsoring this measure.●

STAR WARS AND ASAT: THE NEED FOR A REASONED DEBATE

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, there is continuing debate over the President's strategic defense initiative [SDI], popularly referred to as the "Star Wars" program, in both bodies of the Congress. There is also increasing recognition of the linkage between the ballistic missile defense [BMD] aspects of the SDI and anti-satellite technologies [ASAT]. In fact, although the Washington Post has supported the unfortunate House position on ASAT testing, it does recognize the relationship between this technology and the BMD requirements of "Star Wars," as evidenced by its June 12 editorial on "The ASAT Question." I emphasized my concerns about the potential impact of the amendment prohibiting ASAT testing on this SDI/ASAT linkage in my floor statement against the Brown amendment to H.R. 5167.

I think the degree of polarization attendant to the debate on these defense issues is unfortunate. The critics of these embryonic programs are assailing the potential cost of SDI, while distorting its goals. On the other hand, the administration seems to have gotten itself in the awkward position of trying to defend features of undefined systems which are one to two decades or more away from deployment. I believe that one of the most constructive statements provided on how to approach the SDI, nee "Star Wars" program, is that of Dr. Donald M. Kerr, Director of the Los Alamos National Laboratory [LANL], before the Senate Armed Services Committee on April 24. As to asking the right questions about the goals of the SDI, Dr. Kerr said:

> Many different and divergent opinions about the strategic defense initiative (SDI) have been expressed by defense analysts, political commentators, and members of the scientific community. An important factor influencing opinions about SDI is the way we think about strategic forces and the policies that guide their employment. My own thinking is based on the questions "Where are we now in strategic terms?" and "How can technology, including strategic defense technology, improve our position?"

He also put this initiative in the proper context of U.S. evolving strategic policy:

> Our current strategic policy is a continuation of an evolutionary process that began in the early 1960s. The United States seeks to deter war by negating the ability of any adversary to achieve his aims by force of arms. We deter massive attacks on ourselves and our allies by maintaining the capability for a devastating response. We also seek to deter limited attacks without having to rely on threats of massive, uncontrolled nuclear strikes. We plan to counter the enemy either by defeating the military forces he commits directly, or by threatening to so damage things of value to him, in a controlled and deliberate fashion, that any gains from his aggression would be outweighed by his potential losses.

Dr. Kerr has a great technical familiarity with the requirements for the SDI since LANL has an extensive involvement in nuclear and nonnuclear systems for SDI, as well as development of prime power sources and the investigations of vulnerability, lethality, and countermeasures attendant to such systems. He also spelled out his own warning about the dangers of premature criticism of this suggested emphasis on strategic defense.

I do have concerns about the harm that can come from premature criticism in the debate over whether or not the country should put a heavy emphasis on strategic defense. First, although we have developed many of the important new ideas and concepts through our nuclear weapons technology base efforts, funds for expansion of these efforts in a major way were to be provided by growth in the DOE's nuclear weapons research, development, and testing budget. . . . I believe it is important, and I would challenge the critics to respond, that we must vigorously perform research to determine what is possible in the strategic defense arena, to inform future decisions to deploy or not to deploy.

Dr. Kerr also pointed out other advantages of R&D on strategic defense systems which have been thus far submerged in the polarized and confused debate on this program.

As a first step, R&D may make available strategic defense systems that we could add incrementally to our offensive forces, maintaining the vitality of our current policy. Limited defenses might improve our ability to manage crises successfully: they could defeat small or accidental attacks. By protecting command and control and national leadership, and by reducing the effectiveness of attacks, they could allow us to respond with deliberation. These defenses could also help us to protect a portion of our land-based retaliatory forces, the very forces which we chiefly rely on for controlled, limited responses.

He concluded his remarks with a carefully tailored statement on the deterrence implications, particularly as regard the benefits of "defenses far less than perfect."

If we do decide to begin incremental additions of defenses to our present forces, to fortify our deterrent policy, that need not be in opposition to the longer term goal of moving toward a more defensive posture which would rely on offensive threats and more on protecting our people. For many years we will not have any possibility of highly effective population defense. When and if important progress is made in the development of strategic defense technologies, we may be in a position to move toward a new, more defensive strategic policy. But we probably do not need to aim only for so-called "total defense"—perfect, leak-proof defense—in order to improve our policy and security. Defenses far less than perfect might practically foreclose the use of offensive nuclear forces to accomplish any realistic and useful national objective. Uncertainty about how many, and which, nuclear weapons would get through the defenses must be very deterring. At some point, even very large attack plans would become quite uncertain. It is also possible that defenses might at some time come to have a cost advantage over the offense. This in combination with a growing difficulty in developing effective offensive plans should provide stimulus to offensive force reductions and to finding alternative ways to accomplish national objectives.

What I have tried to indicate so far is that strategic defenses could prove to be very valuable to strategic policy as currently formulated, and may, if their promise is fulfilled, go on to contribute to a new, safer policy in the future. For a number of reasons we may ultimately decide not to go ahead and deploy defense systems. I think that our approach to research and development of strategic defenses should be vigorous and positive, but cautious. The present program is that. The government is currently committed to an R&D program, not to deployment of defenses. A number of defensive weapon systems and concepts are in development which have different characteristics, different potential capabilities, and different implications for strategic policy. We do not yet know which concepts will lead to practical weapons. Nor do we know the strategic situation that might prevail when we are in a position to decide whether to build and deploy these weapons. We are not yet in a position to decide to deploy defense, but we would be improvident to deny ourselves the choices that these programs may open to us.

I hope that my colleagues will weigh Dr. Kerr's remarks heavily so that the Congress can approach its future deliberations on both the SDI and ASAT programs with a comprehensive view and an open mind.●

MAYORS SUPPORT GAY CIVIL RIGHTS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Conference of Mayors, at its annual meeting on June 18 in Philadelphia, unanimously adopted a resolution recognizing the right of all citizens, regardless of sexual orientation, to full participation in American society and recommending that all levels of government adopt legal protections for gay and lesbian Americans.

As chief sponsor, with Congressman Waxman, of a bill (H.R. 2624) which would prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in employment, housing, and public facilities, I would like to commend the USCM for its action and bring the resolution to the attention of my colleagues.

The resolutions that USCM approves at its annual meetings are forwarded to Congress and to the administration to indicate the policy of the mayors of 850 American cities with populations of over 30,000. Currently, more than 50 cities and countries have gay civil rights legal protections. In addition, a number of other organizations have endorsed gay civil rights legislation, including the National Council of Churches, the American Psychiatric Association, and the National Organization for Women [NOW]. Many religious denominations, recognizing the distinction between support for civil rights and approval of a lifestyle, strongly support gay civil rights legislation. These include the Lutheran Church in America, the United Church of Christ, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and the Episcopal Church.

Recently, labor organizations have begun taking strong stands on gay civil rights. The American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees [AFSCME], the Service Employees International Union [SEIU], the International Ladies Garment Workers Union [ILGWU], and the AFL-CIO at its most recent national convention have come out in favor of legislation to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation. Moreover, national polls clearly demonstrate that the majority of Americans support fair treatment in employment for homosexuals.

Support is growing steadily for H.R. 2624, which now has 76 cosponsors. In the Senate, a bill (S. 430) to prohibit discrimination in employment on the basis of sexual orientation has been sponsored by Senator PAUL TSONGAS. These bills would provide no special privileges nor make any value judgments about homosexuality. Rather, they would simply extend to gays and lesbians the same individual rights that the rest of us take for granted. Sexual orientation should not be considered legitimate grounds for denying an individual employment, housing, or access to public facilities any more than race, creed, color, or sex.

The USCM resolution was cosponsored by Trenton, NJ, Mayor Arthur Holland; East Orange, NJ, Mayor Thomas Cooke, and Washington, DC, Mayor Marion Barry. The full text of the USCM resolution follows:

Whereas, lesbians and gay men constitute, according to most estimates, 10 percent of the U.S. population, representing a substantial segment of American society in communities across the country; and

Whereas, existing civil rights legislation does not, according to court rulings, protect gay men and lesbians from discrimination based on sexual orientation, thus denying them the equal protection of the law guaranteed to other minority groups; and

Whereas, research and statistical surveys have demonstrated that gay men and lesbians are subject to discrimination based on sexual orientation in the workplace, in housing, in relations to the criminal and civil justice systems, and in the conduct of their everyday lives; and

Whereas, gay men and lesbians are subject to government-sanctioned discrimination in such areas as exclusion from military service and denial of immigration; and

Whereas, more than fifty state and local jurisdictions in the United States have already adopted and had successful experience with legal protections against discrimination based on sexual orientation; and

Whereas, gay/lesbian civil rights protections are supported by a cross-section of Americans—ranging from the National Council of Churches to the AFL-CIO; and

Whereas, the U.S. Conference of Mayors has traditionally taken a strong stand in support of the civil rights of all Americans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the U.S. Conference of Mayors recognizes the right of all citizens, regardless of sexual orientation, to full participation in American society, and recommends that all levels of government adopt legal protections for the rights of gay and lesbian Americans. The Conference calls on its colleagues to consider executive and legislative remedies to guarantee equal opportunity and protection in the public and private sectors.●

PHARMACEUTICAL ASSISTANCE FOR THE AGED

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which will expand the current Medicaid Program to provide out-of-hospital prescription drug coverage to approximately 7.5 million elderly persons over age 65 with limited incomes.

This legislation would establish a new medically needy category under the current Medicaid Program. It would help those who are most affected by high prescription costs: Those chronically ill aged individuals whose income is too high to be eligible for Medicaid, yet whose prescription drug expenses represent a significant percentage of their yearly income. I believe it meets a vital need of the elderly, particularly those with chronic illnesses and conditions which require medications essential for their well-being and even their survival. For those senior citizens with limited and fixed incomes, the legislation would help to cushion the ever-rising costs of drugs and pharmaceuticals.

Specifically, the legislation which I am introducing would provide Medicaid matching funds to any State that wished to establish a medically needy program to help pay for prescription drugs, insulin, insulin syringes, and insulin needles for its citizens over 65 years of age whose annual income did not exceed $12,000 for an individual or $15,000 for a married couple living together. The program would require that, unless medically inappropriate, generic drugs be used, and that the person pay a copayment ranging from $2 to $5 as follows: $2 for drugs less than $10; $3 for drugs between $10 and $25; $4 for drugs between $25 and $50; and $5 for drugs costing over $50. The variable copayment is intended to discourage too large a prescription unit from being prescribed at one time to avoid paying multiple copayments. The pharmacist would be reimbursed the reasonable cost established by the State for the drug, minus the amount of the copayment, plus a dispensing fee.

The need for this legislation is evidenced by the fact that our current system of providing health care for the elderly is woefully inadequate. Medicare, as we have heard time and time again, does not cover the costs of prescription drugs. Medicaid, which does provide this coverage, does not cover those low-income elderly whose income exceeds the relatively low SSI related income and resource limits. Yet, out-of-pocket expenditures by seniors for prescription drugs ranks second only to hospital care. Drugs now account for almost 23 percent of all private health care. Drugs now account for almost 23 percent of all private health expenses for older Americans.

The burden to pay for, in many instances, life-sustaining drugs—falls most heavily on those who can least afford it—the low-income elderly who suffer from chronic illness, most of whom are not covered by Medicaid. Drug costs for this group are nearly six times as great as for younger Americans. Of the total expenditures for drugs for the aged, only 13 percent are covered by public programs; 87 percent must now be paid out-of-pocket. Experience with a program to pay for drugs for the elderly in New Jersey covering the same income and age categories shows that the average senior spends $242 out of his or her own pocket to pay for prescription drugs per year. These figures do not reflect the full burden of drug costs for the chronically ill elderly whose costs are substantially higher than this $242 figure.

Proposals for coverage of prescription drugs for the elderly have been considered by Congress in the past. Drug legislation was passed by the Senate in 1967, 1972, and 1973 but did not make it through conference with the House. The arguments are that such a program would cost too much, could not be controlled, and could not be efficiently administered. These were all proposals to place a drug program either under Medicare or under a separate new agency. My proposal would keep Federal and State costs to a minimum and would build upon the current Medicaid system.

The Congressional Budget Office estimates that 7.5 million elderly would be assisted under this program. The bill sets no limits on the number of prescriptions that would be paid for per year. However, it is fair to assume that the average senior would fill or refill 22 prescriptions per year with an average cost per prescription of $13. Therefore, if all 50 States participate in this program, on a 50–50 matching basis, and with establishing the most generous income limitations allowed under this bill, the annual cost to the Government might reach $1 billion. However, it would be my expectation based on the fine record already established by the Department of Health and Human Services under Secretary Heckler, that reductions in costs attributable to fraud, waste, and abuse would continue to be reduced and these savings could be applied to a new program of this type. Estimates point to Medicare and Medicaid losing some $7 billion a year to fraud, waste, and abuse. Clearly that number can and should be reduced.

As an original member of the House Select Committee on Aging, I have been in the forefront of efforts in this House to assure adequate protection of health benefits for the elderly. As we have heard time and time again in hearings by our committee—the current system of Medicare coverage is inadequate. It is inadequate because it fails to meet some of the most very basic health care needs of the elderly—including drugs. Just this week, I conducted a meeting with the first group of senior citizens in the Close Up Foundation and found this a primary concern of theirs.

Two States, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, have already passed legislation similar to what I am introducing today. We need to encourage expansion on a national basis so that all needy elderly can receive some modest assistance in this area. This bill would provide the impetus for States, in partnership with the Federal Government, to provide comprehensive health care for the elderly. Adoption of this legislation would provide the impetus we need to expand benefits under Medicare as a subsequent step, to assure that all elderly citizens are provided this kind of health insurance to which they are entitled.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I am inserting the text of this bill into the RECORD. I urge them to join with me in supporting this initiative. The text of this bill follows:

H.R. 5977

TO AMEND TITLE XIX OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT TO PROVIDE FOR AN OPTIONAL PROGRAM OF PHARMACEUTICAL ASSISTANCE TO THE AGED UNDER THE MEDICAID PROGRAM

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Pharmaceutical Assistance to the Aged Act".

SEC. 2. Title XIX of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"PHARMACEUTICAL ASSISTANCE TO THE AGED

"SEC. 1919. (a)(1) Notwithstanding sections 1902(a)(10) and 1916 of this Act, a State plan for medical assistance under this title may provide for making medical assistance available with respect to individuals described in subsection (b) for outpatient prescribed drugs and other items described in subsection (c) furnished in accordance with subsection (d), but only if—

"(A) the State has in effect a law meeting the requirements of paragraph (2)(A), and

"(B) the State plan under this title provides that the amount of payment under the plan with respect to interchangeable drug products for which substitution by a pharmacist is permitted under paragraph (2)(A) shall not exceed the amount of payment recognized under the plan for the least expensive of such interchangeable drug product.

"(2)(A) A State law referred to in paragraph (1) is a law which permits a licensed pharmacist to substitute an interchangeable drug product (as defined in subparagraph (B)) of lesser cost for another drug product, unless a licensed physician specifically provides in writing with respect to that prescription that such substitution is medically inappropriate.

"(B) For purposes of this subsection, drug products shall be considered to be 'interchangeable' with each other with respect to a medical indication or treatment if the drug products are therapeutically equivalent (as determined by the Secretary) with respect to such medical indication or treatment.

"(3)(A) The amount of the medical assistance furnished under this plan with respect to a prescribed drug or other item is the amount determined under subparagraph (B) reduced by a copayment amount determined under subparagraph (C).

"(B) The amount of payment under this section for a drug product is the amount otherwise allowable under the plan (subject to paragraph (1)(B)) with respect to the item, without regard to any deductibles, coinsurance, or copayments which might otherwise be imposed.

"(C) In the case of an individual eligible for medical assistance under the plan under this section—

"(i) no enrollment fee, premium, or similar charge will be imposed under the plan, and

"(ii) no deduction, cost sharing, or similar charge will be imposed under the plan, except that payment of a copayment in an amount described in subparagraph (D) shall be required under the plan with respect to each prescription unit of drug or item provided.

"(D) In the case of a prescribed drug or other item for which payment under this section for a prescription unit otherwise is—

"(i) less than $10, the copayment amount referred to in subparagraph (C)(ii) is equal to $2,

"(ii) $10 or more, but less than $25, the copayment amount referred to in subparagraph (C)(ii) is equal to $3,

"(iii) $25 or more, but less than $50, the copayment amount referred to in subparagraph (C)(ii) is equal to $4, and

"(iv) $50 or more, the copayment amount referred to in subparagraph (C)(ii) is equal to $5.

The Secretary shall provide guidelines for the establishment of reasonable prescription units for purposes of implementation of this section.

"(b)(1) An individual referred to in subsection (a) is an individual who—

"(A) is 65 years of age or older,

"(B) is a resident of the United States and is either (i) a citizen or (ii) an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence or otherwise permanently residing in the United States under color of law (including an alien lawfully present in the United States as a result of the application of section 212(d)(5) of the Immigration and Nationality Act),

"(C) has an annual income (as determined under paragraph (2)) of not more than the income limitation established by the State under paragraph (3), and

"(D) is not otherwise eligible for medical assistance under the plan.

"(2) As used in paragraph (1), the term 'annual income' means gross annual income from all sources, including alimony or support funds, the gross amount of pensions and annuities, benefits received under this Act (other than under this title or titles V or XVIII), benefits received under State unemployment insurance laws and veterans' disability payments, interest received from the Federal Government or any State government or any instrumentality or political subdivision thereof, realized capital gains, rentals, workers' compensation benefits and life insurance benefits and proceeds, except that such term does not include—

"(A) the first $5,000 of the total of death benefits payments received with respect to the death of a spouse,

"(B) gifts of cash or property, to the extent they do not exceed a total of $300 in any year, or

"(C) surplus food or other relief in kind supplied by a government agency or as a property tax rebate.

"(3) A State, for purposes of this section, may establish an income limitation of—

"(A) not less than $9,000, nor more than $12,000, with respect to individuals (i) who are not married or (ii) who are married but who maintain a separate residence apart from their spouse and who do not receive support from their spouse or have access to their spouse's income, or

"(B) not less than $12,000, nor more than $15,000, with respect to other individuals who are married.

In the case of an individual described in subparagraph (B), the income limitation shall be applied to the aggregate annual income of the individual and of the individual's spouse.

"(4) A State shall provide for recertifications of income of individuals described in paragraph (1) who have applied and been found eligible for benefits under this section not less often than annually.

"(c) The outpatient prescribed drugs and other items referred to in subsection (a) means legend drugs (other than experimental drugs), insulin, insulin syringes, and insulin needles furnished or administered to an individual while the individual is not an inpatient of a hospital, skilled nursing facility, intermediate care facility, or mental institution.

"(d) The Secretary shall provide, not less often than annually, for informing individuals who—

"(1) are 65 years of age or older and

"(2) are entitled to benefits under part A, or enrolled for benefits under part B, of title XVIII, of the benefits available under this section in States which have elected to have a program of pharaceutical assistance for the aged pursuant to this section.".

SEC. 3. Section 1902(a) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) in paragraph (10), by striking out "and" at the end of clause (III), and by adding before the semicolon at the end the following: ", and (V) this paragraph shall not apply with respect to the provision of medical assistance described in section 1919", and

(2) in paragraph (37), by inserting "for prescribed drugs under the plan or" after "payment made".

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall promulgate final regulations not later than September 1, 1985, in order to provide for State implementation of the amendments made by this Act on a timely basis.

(b) The amendments made by this Act shall apply to medical assistance furnished with respect to outpatient prescribed drugs furnished on or after October 1, 1985.

SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall maintain statistical records on State programs of pharmaceutical assistance to the aged under section 1919 of the Social Security Act to determine the effectiveness and impact of such programs, including the level of participation by the elderly and any patterns of unusual drug usage, and to provide for the report required under subsection (b).

(b) Based on such information, the Secretary shall submit a report to the Congress, at the time of the transmittal of the budget of the Department of Health and Human Services to the Congress for fiscal year 1987, containing information relating to—

(1) the States providing for such programs,

(2) the number of persons covered under such programs,

(3) the number and kinds of drug products for which assistance was provided under such programs,

(4) the costs of the assistance furnished, including an estimate of actual expenses incurred by pharmacists participating in such programs, and

(5) the timeliness and accuracy of payments made to pharmacists under such programs.

The report also shall contain such recommendations for changes in legislation as the Secretary determines to be appropriate.●

TRIBUTE TO MR. PAREDES

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, June 1, 1984, marks the retirement of one good-natured gadfly of the joint council of the Teamsters Union. He served for 34 years in the Teamsters Union—the last 12½ as secretary-treasurer of Hayward Local 588. Mr. Paredes has actually been a union member since 1946, when he came out of the Navy after World War II where he saw combat on aircraft carriers in both the Pacific and at the Normandy beaches on D-day II.

He joined ILWU Local 6 in San Francisco and served as a trustee in 1949. He joined Teamsters Local 12 in 1950. After some time with local 655, he transferred into local 588 in 1959 as a business agent. He was first elected secretary-treasurer in 1971.

The mustachioed and distinguished-looking man will be missed by delegates as the perennial challenger of many council actions and often as a dissenting minority of one.

I would like to cite this testimony in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a tribute to Mr. Paredes' lifelong commitment to society and his quest for justice. His greatest satisfaction as a teamster leader, he said, was in "helping minority people get jobs."●

TENNESSEE NATIONAL GUARD

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday and Friday, June 21 and 22, I had the opportunity to view and to participate in portions of the annual training of units of the Tennessee National Guard from my district. I cannot overemphasize to my colleagues in the House the extraordinary degree of professionalism, dedication, and commitment that I saw in the officers and men of the 196th Field Artillery Brigade, the 1/181st Field Artillery Battalion, and the 30th Separate Armored Brigade.

For those of my colleagues who have not had the opportunity in recent years to observe the high caliber and readiness of the National Guard, I believe you will be most impressed with today's Guard Forces. The vast majority of these men and women have successful careers in civilian life and are active in their communities. Yet, they are willing to give up 1 weekend each month and 2 weeks in the summer to sharpen and refine their military skills. For some of the young people I talked with, the 2 weeks training they are performing in Camp Shelby, MS, is the only vacation time they will have for this year, but they are willing to make that sacrifice in order to participate in the National Guard. Many of these young people whom I spoke with on Thursday had been out in the field sleeping on the ground or on the artillery pieces since the preceding Sunday. They were hot, tired, and thirsty, but they were also proud of the job they were doing, thoroughly skilled and trained, and highly motivated.

Individuals from these units have participated in training exercises with their affiliated Regular Army units. I was told by both Tennessee National Guard commanders and by Regular Army officers observing this summer camp that those guardsmen were rated as outstanding in the performance of their duties with active duty Army units.

Defense dollars are stretched tighter today than at any other time in recent years. Expenditures for the Guard and Reserve components of the military yield an extremely high return when compared to the added defense capability they produce.

For any Member who has not in the last few years taken a firsthand look at the National Guard, I urge you to do so. Today's National Guard is a sophisticated, effective, and reliable part of the total-Army concept. They deserve not only our gratitude, but our active support in providing them with modern equipment and ample opportunity to train with that equipment.

In particular I want to single out the outstanding accomplishments of the Tennessee National Guard, the 196th Field Artillery Brigade, and the 1/181st Field Artillery Battalion from Chattanooga, TN, for their performance in the exercises I had the opportunity to observe. I am confident that they are examples of the immense improvement in our Guard and Reserve Forces. I congratulate them and I take this opportunity to tell all my colleagues of the immense pride I feel about the defense contribution these men and women are making to the United States.●

IN MEMORIAM—MOE M. TONKON: 1905-84

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in tribute to a very great man who died recently in Portland, OR. Moe M. Tonkon was born in 1905 in Bender, Russia, the son of a hatmaker. If events had occurred differently, Moe, too, might have become a hatmaker in Bender. Fortunately for him, and for the people of Oregon, his family emigrated to Portland in 1906.

After attending Reed College and the Northwest College of Law in the mid-1920's, Moe opened his own one-man law office in Portland. Today the firm of Tonkon, Torp, Galen, Marmaduke & Booth is one of the largest legal firms in the State. Moe's legal career was very impressive. In fact, Multnomah County Presiding Court Judge Charles S. Crookham called him "one of the great lawyers of the State."

But I believe Moe was even more proud of the numerous civic and philanthropic activities which he was involved in throughout his long life. He was past president of the Library Association of Portland, the Oregon Historical Society, and the Portland Junior Symphony. Moe also served on the board of Reed College, St. Vincent Hospital & Medical Center, the St. Vincent Medical Foundation, the United Good Neighbors, the Columbia Pacific Council of the Boy Scouts of America, the Multnomah County Chapter of the American Red Cross, and the Portland Art Museum.

Moe Tonkon was a soft-spoken man. Not one to boast about his many accomplishments, he was content to let others receive the publicity, and confident enough to know that his actions and selfless dedication to his community would earn him the respect he deserved.

Even when breaking through the prejudicial religious barriers which blocked members of his faith from joining exclusive clubs in the Portland area, he was quiet and self-assured. When a reporter asked Moe about his third successful entry into a hitherto restrictive club, he said, "I don't want any publicity on all this. Somebody had to be first and I think that now people will be accepted at all these clubs on an individual basis." Thanks to people like Moe M. Tonkon, these religious, racial, and sexual barriers are beginning to fall in clubs and organizations throughout the country.

Moe would probably be embarrassed by this tribute to his life and accomplishments, but when someone like Moe comes along, someone who stands out so dramatically by his life's deeds, I feel it is fitting that we express our admiration and gratitude for all that he achieved and all that he contributed. He is deeply missed.●

SOLIDARITY WITH THE ETHIOPIAN JEWS

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, the plight of the Jews of Ethiopia remains a matter of deep concern to me and to their other friends and supporters in the United States. It is for this reason that I have joined in sponsoring House Concurrent Resolution 107, expressing the concern of the Congress for the plight of the Ethiopian Jewish community and why it is an obligation for me to participate in this special order.

Ethiopia's Jews are otherwise known as the Falashas, which means strangers or landless persons. They have lived in Ethiopia for over 2,000 years, and first settled there in the Biblical period. A millennium ago, they numbered over half a million, and enjoyed political and religious freedom. Since then, however, their numbers have steadily decreased. In 1900, there were 100,000 Falashas, and now there are less than 20,000 Jews in Ethiopia. Unless measures are taken soon to stop this decline, this ancient community will soon disappear.

Mr. Speaker, for centuries the Jews of Ethiopia were subjected to enslavement, forced conversion, land confiscation, and physical persecution. Even today they suffer from forced privation, isolation, discrimination, and brutal mistreatment. Falashas have been executed as government agents and suppressed as dissidents. According to reports, Jewish schools have been closed, Jewish teachers have been dismissed, and synagogues have been closed down. But in spite of these efforts to harass and persecute the Jewish community, the Falashas have managed to survive. It is truly a testament to the courage and tenacity of this beleaguered community that some 20,000 Falashas remain alive today in Ethiopia.

Mr. Speaker, the plight of the Falashas is exacerbated by the effects of the worst drought to have beset Ethiopia and other regions of Africa in a decade. Relief organizations have estimated that the drought threatens 3.2 million Ethiopians and that up to 150 are dying each day due to drought and famine. The Falashas' living conditions are further aggravated by the continuous strife between the Government and the rebel troops in the northern part of the country.

The Ethiopian Government has denied the allegations of persecution and discrimination of the Falashas. Yet the truth of the matter is that most of the Falashas want to leave Ethiopia and settle in Israel. They and the approximately 3,000 Ethiopian Jews who have managed to find their way to refugee camp facilities in neighboring Sudan want to be united with the approximately 4,000 Falashas now living in Israel. Israel is willing and ready to accept them and to integrate them into Israeli society. Yet emigration from Ethiopia is barred under Ethiopian law and is highly difficult and dangerous.

It is my strong belief that all Ethiopian Jews who wish to emigrate to Israel should be allowed to do so as quickly as possible. It is also my firm conviction that it is crucial to promote greater U.S. official and public awareness of the plight of these brave and courageous people. By calling attention to the plight of the Falashas and their fervent wish to emigrate to Israel, we are letting them know that we here in Congress have not forgotten them and their longstanding yearning for freedom and religious liberty.●

NATIONAL HISTORY DAY

HON. DANIEL B. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DANIEL B. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, this year, the National Endowment for the Humanities' National History Day involved some 150,000 secondary school students from over 40 States. This year's theme to be followed in the preparation of papers, projects, performances, and media presentations was "Family and Community in Media."

National History Day itself is the culmination of a series of contests held at the staff and district levels, judged by hundreds of historians and educators. The research that students do for their projects, guided by their teachers, stimulates imagination and creativity as well as scholarship, reading, and writing skills.

Lesley Meneley, a resident of Pesotum, IL, and a student at Unity Junior High School, was one of those chosen from over 150,000 participants to compete at the National Finals of History Day at the University of Maryland on June 13-16 of this year. Lesley's entry, which was completed with the help of her teacher, Mrs. June Carrel, is a paper entitled "The Meneley Chautauqua." This paper is a fine example of the intelligence and potential which is found in the youth of this great country.

Congratulations Lesley, Mrs. Carrel, and Unity Junior High School. Keep up the good work. All of America is with you.●

EXPRESSION OF SOLIDARITY WITH THE ETHIOPIAN JEWS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, this week is being observed in the United States, Canada, and Israel as an International Week of Solidarity with Ethiopian Jews. At this time I would like to join my colleagues in expressing continued support for and solidarity with both the Falasha community in Israel and those Jews still living in Ethiopia.

The Jewish community of Ethiopia is one that has survived for over 2,000 years. It has persevered despite centuries of numerous conflicts, tribal wars, persecution, and oppression; and it continues to survive in a land of stark poverty and rampant disease. The Jews of Ethiopia continue to live in a country wrought with internal strife and political insurrections. It is a country that has been devastated by a 2-year drought.

The Ethiopian Jews are a hardy community—one dedicated to preserving its religious traditions and way of life. Despite the fact that some 7,000 have already found greater religious freedom in Israel, a small Jewish community remains in Ethiopia, unable to join their loved ones in Israel and unable to realize their dream of freedom and greater religious liberty. As one who recognizes the courage and perseverance of both those Jews who have made the trek to the promised land, Israel, and those living in Ethiopia who must endure great physical hardship, I am a cosponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 107, expressing the concern of the Congress for the plight of this small beleaguered community. A similar resolution has already passed the Senate and I sincerely hope that this resolution will soon be enacted by the House.

The Jewish community of Ethiopia is one of that yearns to emigrate to Israel to join their loved ones and live a life of greater freedom and religious liberty. The dreams and aspirations of this brave community must not be forgotten and I feel honored to express my solidarity with these courageous and devout people.●

THE CRITICAL IMPORTANCE OF INTERNATIONAL POPULATION ASSISTANCE

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 28, 1984

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN] for taking this special order on the role of the United States in international population assistance. I appreciate having this opportunity to express my views on this critical subject. Hopefully it is not too late to avert what could be a foreign policy disaster for our country.

White House policymakers, as we know, have drafted a controversial and misguided position paper to be delivered at the U.S. International Population Conference in August in Mexico City. The announcement of a new U.S. population policy will occur a week before the opening of the Republican Convention in Dallas.

Partisan politics, it appears, is about to: First, overturn a 20-year bipartisan commitment to international family planning; second, subvert current U.S. foreign assistance law; and third, reverse the Reagan administration's own population assistance policies of the past 3½ years.

The White House position paper largely dismisses the importance of family planning. It ignores the enormous unmet demand and need for family planning services around the world and instead, focuses exclusively on the need to deregulate developing Nation's economies.

The draft paper also proposes to halt U.S. Government funds to family planning organizations that may use non-Government moneys to pay for abortion-related activities. This goes beyond current U.S. law which prohibits the use of U.S. population aid to pay for abortions, abortion research, or the promotion of any abortion-related activities. Ironically, the new proposal seeks to further regulate and condition any U.S. population assistance, direct or indirect, to the very countries it blames for not deregulating and decentralizing their economic policies. Such inconsistent logic will not be lost on the developing nations.

The draft paper altogether misses the problem in blaming socialist or centralized economies rather than population growth for Third World poverty. It is no accident that the relatively prosperous, developed nations of the world have largely market-oriented economies and enjoy low and manageable population growth. But none of these nations, particularly the United States, have ever experienced the rampant population growth that has impeded economic development in the Third World. Without manageable population growth and the resources to achieve it, no nation will be able to achieve healthy economic expansion, decentralize their economies, and move toward the free enterprise that the White House policymakers advocate and all of us would like to see occur.

Changes in present U.S. population policy on the scale the draft paper outlines will undoubtedly produce suspicion and resentment among the nations of the developing world. More, not less population assistance, is what the Third World countries are seeking. The alternative is increased political instability, greater indebtedness, accelerated depletion of scarce natural resources, hunger, famine, and a rise in international migration toward our own borders.

All these factors would have significant and detrimental consequences for the United States.

And it is no accident that the Soviet Union opposes family planning efforts because they realize what the administration conveniently ignores—that uncontrolled population growth directly contributes to political and civil unrest, and consequently, provides opportunities for the Soviets and their surrogates to spread their influence.

The administration's policy focuses on the need for economic growth in the developing countries. This is a noble cause and one which I support, but to rely on economic growth to solve population problems is totally unrealistic under the present circumstances.

During a visit to Honduras last year with other members of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I asked Ubodoro Arriaga, the head of the Agrarian Reform Institute, at what rate the Honduran economy was growing. He told me it was struggling to reach zero percent. At the same time the population in this country was growing at a rate of 3.6 percent each year and urban growth is over 5 percent. Since 1970, the annual growth rate of the Honduran population has been rising while the growth rate of the economy, particularly food production, has been falling. Over the same period, the growth rate of the U.S. economy has declined as well but it has been accompanied by an even sharper decline in the population growth rate. So the average annual income for Americans has risen dramatically since 1970. The average annual income in Honduras is $600—the lowest in the Western Hemisphere only after Haiti.

Honduras is not an isolated case. The sharp increases in the price of oil in the early 1970's and the world recession that followed has most adversely affected the nations of the developing world. The gap between the have and have-not nations increased. But at the same time more than 90 percent of the world's population growth is occurring in the less-developed countries, many of which cannot provide the basic needs of their existing populations for food, shelter, jobs, and education.

The world will grow by 84 million people in 1984—the largest increase in a single year in history. It took 100 years for the world's population to double from 1 billion in 1830 to 2 billion in 1930. The world now grows by 1 billion in less than 15 years. Those born in 1930 will have seen the 3, 4, 5, and 6 billion people added to the world in their lifetime.

The average woman in Kenya gives birth to about eight children during her childbearing years. In Syria, the fertility rate is seven and it is six in Bangladesh and Bolivia. All of these nations are experiencing little or no economic growth. In contrast, the fertility rate is 1.8 in the United States, 1.6 in Italy, and 1.4 in West Germany—all among the world's most prosperous nations.

The world economy expanded about 5 percent a year between 1950 and 1973—the year of the Arab oil embargo. During the same period, population grew at less than 2 percent. But since 1979, economic and population growth have both been about 1.7 percent annually. In those nations where the population rate is more than the economic growth rate, living standards have declined. During the 1970's there were 18 such nations, most of them in Africa. Today, thousands are dying of starvation and disease in sub-Saharan Africa as a terrible drought has stricken the very peoples least able to endure such a catastrophe.

But there are some reasons for optimism, largely because of the success of population programs; 20 years ago, the U.N. Fund for Population Assistance was created—with the strong leadership of the United States, because the United Nations and the United States recognized that uncontrolled population growth stands in the way of the achievement of economic and political objectives. About 50 developing countries, accounting for most of the population of the Third World, have adopted population programs with positive results. In a number of those nations that have had effective family planning programs over the last 15 to 20 years, such as Thailand, Costa Rica, Panama, and Korea, population growth rates have begun to fall. As a result, these nations have been spared the worst of the deteriorating economic conditions that have hit those nations with little or no family planning such as Chad, Bolivia, and Ethiopia.

Most importantly, Mr. Speaker, is the humanitarian basis for population assistance. Millions of women in the developing world desire to determine the size and spacing of their families, but lack the simple means to implement this basic human choice, a choice which we take for granted. This is not the time to slash our assistance to these families but rather to increase it. For example, the 1979 world fertility study of 15 developing countries showed that while one-half of all married women of reproductive age want no more children, one-half of those same women do not have access to effective methods of family planning. In Pakistan, one of the countries studied, only 10 percent of all married women had every used contraception of any kind.

There is a sizable backlog, both at USAID and at the UNFPA of desperately needed projects.

That is why in 1983 and again this year I offered, and the House Foreign Affairs Committee accepted substantial increases in America's international population assistance program.

It is true that economic growth needs to be stimulated in the developing world, but population growth also needs to be stabilized. To try to accomplish the first and ignore the second solves nothing. Idealogy and a particular economic philosophy have never dictated U.S. population assistance in the past and it ought not to do so now, or ever.●

REPLACEMENT MOTOR FUELS ACT OF 1984

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, earlier this week, myself along with Representatives CONTE, D'AMOURS, GLICKMAN, SNOWE, TAUKE, and WALGREN introduced the Replacement Motor Fuels Act of 1984.

In 1979, I introduced similar legislation which received the support of over 100 House Members. At that time, the idea of reducing our dependcnce on OPEC oil imports while encouraging the development of domestic energy sources made a great deal of sense. The Iraqi and Iranian war, and the problems in the Persian Gulf, have again emphasized the vulnerability of oil supplies to the Western World. In addition, lower than anticipated oil prices have underlined the difficulty in trying to supply domestic replacements for imported petroleum.

Our proposal creates an assured market for substitute fuels. Any number of alternatives are available or can be produced to meet this mandate, including alcohol from grains, wood, or garbage, synthetic fuel from coal, or oil from shale. The fuels would be determined by marketplace competition. There would be no cost to the Federal Government, except for enforcement.

Per a schedule to be set by the Department of Energy, refiners would be required to phase in substitute fuels, beginning in 1986, with quantities increasing to 10 percent of their total gasoline production by 1992. They could mix the fuels themselves, or contract with others to do it. They would have flexibility to alter their percentages at different times of the year and among the geographic regions they serve. If they failed to meet the goal at the end of the year, they would be fined $1 for each gallon of fuel sold in violation of the law.

In 1983, gasoline consumption represented 43 percent of the total amount of oil used in the United States. By reducing that amount by 10 percent with the use of replacement fuels, we can at current rates reduce our imports of crude oil by 500,000 barrels per day and provide an additional market for surplus grains, as well as a competitive stimulus for alternative fuels projects. With the EPA phaseout of leaded gasoline, there is also the added feature of providing clean, fuel-efficient octane enhancers.

The cost of the consumer of 10 percent replacement can be estimated:

Cost of a gallon of gasoline	$1.22
Reduced by 10 percent	−.12
Total	1.10

Assuming replacement fuel costs of as much as $69 per barrel refined, the cost of a gallon of replacement equals $1.64; or, one-tenth gallon in each gallon of gas equals $0.165 per gallon for the cost of replacement fuel.

Total per-gallon cost of the mixture is then:

Gasoline	$1.10
Replacement fuel	.165
Total	1.265

Thus, even a very conservative estimate shows a price increase of less than 4 percent at the gas pump in exchange for energy independence. While the costs to the consumer would be very small, the costs to the taxpayer would be almost nonexistent. The octane enhancing qualities of replacement fuels, resulting in a more efficient and powerful fuel, should also be taken into account when reviewing these numbers.

I urge all my colleagues to give this proposal serious consideration. It is critical that we do not become complacent with today's world oil situation.

ANALYSIS OF REPLACEMENT MOTOR FUELS ACT OF 1984

I. Section 1 is the title of the bill, as indicated above.

II. Section 2 sets out Congress' findings as to the necessity for replacement fuels to decrease the need for imported crude oil.

III. Section 3 defines the terms used in the bill, including alcohol, replacement fuel, replacement motor fuel, renewable resource, etc., as used in the bill. The term "replacement fuel" is broad enough to include alcohol or any other liquid produced from coal, oil, shale or other substance that can be mixed with gasoline and used as a motor fuel. The Secretary of Energy is designated as the major implementer of the program.

IV. Section 4 requires the Secretary of Energy to establish a program to promote the development and use of replacement fuels in the United States. Specifically, the Secretary is required to design a program promoting replacement of gasoline with the maximum percentage of replacement fuel as is economically and technically feasible for use as motor fuel.

V. Section 5 requires the Secretary of Energy, in consultation with the Secretary of Transportation, Agriculture, Commerce and any other appropriate agency, to establish a development plan and production goals for the optimal production of replacement fuel in the U.S. in calendar years 1986 through 1992. The ultimate goal, by calendar year 1997, is to replace 20 percent or more, by volume, of the projected consumption of gasoline used as a motor fuel in the U.S. for that year. the interim goals for 1992 through 1996 is 10 percent replacement, by volume, of the projected consumption of gasoline used as a motor fuel in the U.S. for each of those years.

In developing the plan, the Secretary of Energy is required to identify ways of encouraging the development of a reliable replacement fuel industry, the barriers to its development, and include an estimate of the production capacity of replacement fuel needed to implement this bill's requirements.

The Secretary has 6 months to complete his development plan and production goals and report to Congress.

VI. Section 6 establishes minimum percentages of replacement fuel to be included in the total quantity of gasoline and replacement fuel sold by any refinery. For CY's 1986 through 1991, to be determined by the Secretary of Energy. For CY's 1992 through 1996, 10 percent. For CY's 1997 and thereafter, 20 percent or more, unless the Secretary establishes, by rule, that 20 percent is inappropriate. The minimum percentages will be based on technical and economic feasibility. Each refiner is required to make annual reports to the Secretary as to the average percentage replacement fuel sold during the preceding calendar year. The Secretary may make adjustments to reduce minimum percentage requirements.

VII. Section 7 sets out the enforcement mechanisms avaliable to the Secretary. Violators are subject to a civil penalty of not more than $1 per gallon for each gallon of fuel not containing a minimum percentage of replacement fuel. When notice of a proposed penalty is issued by the Secretary, two choices are available to the refiner: (1) he may request a hearing before an administrative law judge, or (2) he may institute action in the U.S. Court of Appeals. The Secretary will institute action in the appropriate district court if the civil penalty has not been paid within 60 calendar days after the assessment order has been made.

VIII. Section 10 ensures the coordination of this Act with the Energy Security Act.●

COMMENDING CORPUS CHRISTI CITIZENS

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to commend several constituents in my district for their work toward beautifying Corpus Christi. Their efforts culminated recently in the dedication of a statue in the westside of the city.

Mr. Arturo Martinez, a member of the Beautify Corpus Christi Association, has for many years worked relentlessly toward beautifying the triangle at the Agnes-Laredo intersection. After many unsuccessful tries, he succeeded in finding funding for the construction of a park in 1981; the result was Plaza De Pineda, a park which was completed 2 years ago.

The success was made possible through generous donations from the Westside Business Association, a well-respected business group from the area. They have worked continuously to meet their charter's goal of "bettering and enriching our community." This project is just one more example of their positive impact on that area of the city.

The association's officers—Arnold Garcia, Carlos Moreno, Oscar Flores, Oscar Garza, Ted Stephens, and Dr. Clotilde Garcia— and its board of directors—Ted Estrada, Noe Mendez, Bud Hoffman, and John Wright—have all helped make this project a success.

Only last week, the westside business group also erected and dedicated a statue of Capt. Alonso Alvarez De Pineda on the site.

The Spanish explorer is an important figure in south Texas history. He explored and mapped the gulf coast, from Veracruz, Mexico to western Florida in the 16th century. According to local tradition, he discovered Corpus Christi Bay and named it after the Feast of Corpus Christi—the day he presumably claimed the territory for his king.

The great Spaniard braved many uncertainties here in the New World in search of glory and treasure. He found both. When he returned to Jamaica, De Pineda took both gold and stories of "nine-foot tall, friendly" natives. This brought him the fame that he had always dreamed of. Indians killed him shortly afterward, on his return voyage, but death could not diminish his legend. He still lives in the many adventure stories which are told along the coast.

His legend is captured in our new statue, which stands in memory of his daring deeds. But the statue and park are also a tribute to the people who worked to put it there; indeed, it stands in honor of all the people who live and work in the westside. These men and women have shown over and over the care they feel for our fair city.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me this time.●

DEFICIT REDUCTION ACT OF 1984

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, which passed the House on June 27, is an example of both an opportunity acted on and an opportunity lost. The bill provides some much needed action behind all of the deficit reduction talk we have been hearing lately by generating $50 billion in additional revenues during the next 4 years and cutting spending by $13 billion. But the reductions are actually only a token, amounting to less than 7 percent of the $900 billion deficit we anticipate by 1988. Think about this for a moment. It means that to be totally effective, a deficit reduction package would have to generate 14 times the savings and revenue generated by this bill.

Mr. Speaker, any time a major piece of legislation, such as the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, is prepared, it invariably contains a number of provisions that are unacceptable. Yet, because of the importance of the task before us it is crucial that we consider the overall impact of the bill rather than the individual changes that we may dislike. I take issue with the changes in Medicare and the extension of what was promised to be a temporary 3-percent excise tax on telephone bills. I am concerned that the change in depreciation schedules for buildings may have a negative impact on the housing industry. I feel that the reduction in taxes on tobacco was a giveaway to a powerful lobby. Nevertheless, I supported this bill because it is the only major piece of legislation that is likely to have any impact on the deficits.

In spite of a number of shortcomings, the bill retains a number of effective programs such as the tax-exempt mortgage revenue bond provision. It improves other tax incentive programs that appear to be working effectively, such as the holding period required for eligibility under captial gains tax rules. It also extends the targeted job tax credits through 1988.

I am pleased that the bill eliminated a number of the least effective tax incentive measures in the current tax law. In some instances it may be true that tax incentives which were effective also fell by the wayside. In any case, I think all will agree that we have squeezed the major sources of revenue as much as we can under the current tax system.

It is obvious that the "down payment" on the deficit is only that. In order to continue our efforts at deficit reduction, it will be necessary to engage in a fundamental reevaluation of our budgetary policies. This means action on the comprehensive reform of the Tax Code that has been promised by the majority. This means a dramatic reassessment of our spending patterns across all categories. This means that we can no longer put our heads in the sand and deny that we are facing a crisis.

Mr. Speaker, I am looking forward to consideration of serious legislation to develop a simpler, more equitable tax system. Such legislation should be ready for consideration as soon as possible in the next Congress and it should be coupled with a rigorous plan for developing a sound budgetary policy that will see us through to the end of this century.●

LULAC'S VIEW OF OUR CENTRAL AMERICA POLICY

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, one of the recommendations advanced by the much-heralded second report of the Inter-American Dialogue, entitled "The Americas in 1984: A Year for Decisions," was to find a way to focus attention on how Hispanic-American communities here in our own country can contribute more fully and positively to improving inter-American communication and mutual understanding.

The Nation's oldest and largest Hispanic organization, the League of United Latin American Citizens [LULAC], with over 110,000 members in 43 States, cognizant of the unique role Hispanic-Americans can play in hemispheric politics, has just recently published a policy statement of its own on the conflict in Central America, entitled "Central America: A Hispanic Analysis." The 25-page booklet, intended as both an educational tool for the Hispanic community and a stimulus to greater Hispanic participation in Latin American issues, represents for Hispanics a first step toward fulfilling the astute recommendation of the Inter-American Dialogue.

Included within its pages are an analysis of the current political and military situation in the region, the outlook for human rights in El Salvador and Nicaragua, and a critique of past and current American policy in Central America. I would like to submit, now, for the RECORD, an excerpt from the booklet that addresses the concerns of the Hispanic community regarding our policy in Central America and criticizes the interventionist policy of the Reagan administration.

The excerpt follows:

WHY SHOULD THE HISPANIC COMMUNITY BE CONCERNED?

Clearly, the political and economic stability of Central American countries has direct implications for every American, but the Hispanic community is particularly sensitive to Latin American policy and politics for a number of reasons. Of foremost concern is the fact that the citizens of the Central American countries are fellow Hispanics. Moreover, they are fellow Hispanics who have suffered overwhelmingly for decades from the lack of political rights and economic opportunity. While their struggle is much more intense and difficult to overcome, it is one which we Hispanics share in the United States. As such, the Hispanic-American community should be particularly sensitive to the issues affecting these Latin American nations.

REFUGEES

The effects of war and chaos that Latin Americans experience in their home countries is affecting the Hispanic community here. Because of the social and political calamities in Central America, a large number of refugees from the region have fled to the United States, resulting in social and economic strains on our society. Our community is extremely sensitive to the situation of these refugees since we are familiar with the paranoia and insensitivity of a U.S. public which uses as scapegoats Spanish-speaking refugees and undocumented persons, as well as the domestic Hispanic population in general. Sadly, it is conceivable that prejudices and charges against our community will escalate as long as the instability in Central America continues to affect the U.S. by bringing refugees to our borders.

In addition, efforts have been made to divide Hispanics in the U.S. from Central American refugees by claiming that refugees take jobs away from Hispanic-Americans. Also, claims are made that if we don't stop communism in El Salvador we will have to confront it in South Texas. These exaggerated and unfounded contentions are designed to invoke fear, divide and confuse us about the issues confronting Central Americans. Our concern should be to better understand the reasons behind the immigration movements of Central Americans to the U.S. We must work to bridge the perceived differences between Hispanic-Americans and the in-coming refugees, for, due to the continued instability in Central America, it is safe to conclude that current immigration patterns will remain. As Central American refugees establish themselves in the United States, primarily in Hispanic-American communities, it is incumbent that we prepare ourselves for adjusting to the attitudes and concerns these refugees bring with them. This must be done in the spirit of Hispanic unity and concern for our people.

VALUABLE TAX DOLLARS

A second concern of the Hispanic community is the fact that our government is spending massive amounts of tax dollars on policies which have little positive effect in Central America. To date, the United States has spent one billion dollars in EL Salvador to support the present Salvadoran government. In Nicaragua, the U.S. Senate recently agreed to spend an additional $21 million to fund the "contra" guerrillas. These facts are particularly distressing to Hispanics who are told that there are not enough funds to address domestic problems facing our own community. As Toney Anaya, Governor of New Mexico said recently, "We care about a defense budet that runs amok while our children go uneducated, unfed, unclothed, and with no health care."

THE ARMED SERVICES

Finally, LULAC shares with many analysts the concern that in the wake of the U.S. invasion of Grenada the possibility of direct intervention by U.S. troops in Central America has approached a very dangerous level. When one considers the perilous situation of the Salvadoran troops and President Reagan's determination that no neighboring country fall to lefist forces while he is still in office, the prospect of military intervention in the region seems unavoidable. Clearly, should any such action occur, it would be felt acutely be Hispanics since we and other minorities are disproportionately represented in the armed services. There is absolutely no doubt that Hispanic-Americans will serve this government when called to duty. Our community's distinguished military record upholds this fact. However, should the Administration decide to intervene in Central America, Hispanic Americans would be put in the emotionally and psychologically difficult position of fighting against our Latin brothers in a war which would be doomed to failure, and more importantly, which could be avoided if our government engaged in a foreign policy based on diplomacy and conciliation instead of military force.●

DOUGLAS COUNTY MADD COMMENDED

HON. HAL DAUB

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, as the Congress addresses the tragic problem of drunk driving at the national level, I would like to share with my colleagues the impressive work being done at the local level by the Douglas County, NE, chapter of Mothers Against Drunk Driving.

Last year, this chapter of MADD, as they are commonly known, purchased an accident investigation mobile unit for the Omaha Police Department. This vehicle is equipped with special devices that make it a "mobile command post" in traffic accidents, drunk driving accident investigations, disaster control, and chemical or toxic disasters.

Additionally, MADD donated a unique traffic enforcement and investigation vehicle to the police department. Both vehicles have proved valuable additions to the police force's drive to curb drunk driving.

The Douglas County chapter has been similarly active this year. During May alone, the group scheduled a wide-range of activities including a "MADD DASH", a seat belt program, "Project Graduation", speaking engagements and proclamation signing ceremonies by local and State officials. Many more activities are scheduled through the remainder of the year.

Further, MADD conducts effective court monitoring and victim support programs.

The Douglas chapter of Mothers Against Drunk Driving has established an exceptional reputation and has performed an immensely valuable public service. Kay Neil, their energetic and dynamic president, has earned the respect and admiration of the entire community.

MADD's efforts are a bright spot in the grim area of drunk driving, and they have our strong support and deep gratitude for their important work.●

SUPPORT GROWS FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS PROTECTION ACT OF 1984

HON. GUY VANDER JAGT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Speaker, I am most proud and delighted to bring to the attention of my colleagues an excellent editorial from the Muskegon Chronicle newspaper in my congressional district, Muskegon, MI, in behalf of H.R. 5845, the Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act of 1984. This fine editorial appeared in the June 27 edition of the newspaper and spells out very clearly why Congress should enact this legislation as quickly as possible.

In expressing concern for the lives of over 570,000 law enforcement officers throughout our Nation, the Chronicle editorial closed with this very solid thought:

As we have said before, the police need all the help we—and the law—can give them.

Principal sponsors of this legislation have pointed out that representatives of the law enforcement community have expressed concern over the production of armor-piercing ammunition. This bill meets that concern over the manufacture of such ammunition without impacting on law-abiding American sportsmen and gun owners.

It's a good bill and has total and complete support. It should and must be enacted this year before this Congress adjourns. The editorial from the Chronicle follows:

[From the Muskegon Chronicle, June 27, 1984]

WELCOME CHANGE! NRA WILL BACK BAN ON COP-KILLER SLUGS

We had almost despaired of seeing it happen.

After years of angry and often bitter debate, the National Rifle Association (NRA) has changed its "there's-no-such-thing-as-a-bullet-or-bad-bullet" stand, and endorsed a White-House-authored bill to ban the manufacture and importation of KTW armor-piercing "Cop Killer" bullets.

Its prospects for adoption are good.

This is very good news—in particular for the nation's 570,000 law enforcement officers. The bullets, the so-called "apple greens," have such an excess of penetrating power that their only purpose is to kill human beings—whether police officers or presidents—who wear bulletproof Kevlar vests.

The bill was modeled on the original legislation authored two years ago by Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, D-N.Y., and this time introduced by Sens. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., and Joseph Biden, D-Del., the chairman and ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee. The bill has 75 cosponsors, including Michigan Sens. Carl Levin and Donald W. Riegle Jr.

As we have many times pointed out, despite the earlier protestations of the NRA, the bullets have no legitimate commercial use, and offer no defensible advantage to sportsmen. What they do represent, as now acknowledged by the NRA, is a totally unacceptable threat to law enforcement officers—officers traditionally valued by the NRA as allies.

The bill would ban their importation and manufacture (not their sale) except for those intended for use by U.S. military forces and federal, state and local law enforcement agencies (although most police officers, including the Michigan State Police, want no part of them), and includes a manadatory jail sentence for using the ammunition in a crime.

Specifically, under the legislation, licensed importers or manufacturers who violate the law would be subject to a fine of up to $10,000, imprisonment for not more than 10 years, and revocation of their federal licenses. There would be a mandatory sentence of not less than five years for anyone, who, during the commission of a violent felony, uses or carries a firearm, and is in possession of armor-piercing ammunition capable of being used in that weapon.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., a leader in the drive for responsible handgun controls, said that in the past month of negotiations his side "has learned something from the NRA, and they have learned something from us. At last, the unfortunate polarizations that have prevented any progress on this complex and emotional issue are receding."

Certainly, and blessedly, it appears so. Agreement on the killer-bullet ban followed an earlier agreement with the NRA on an important distinction between sporting weapons and the small, easily concealed handguns—"Snubbies" and "Saturday Night Specials"—which are so widely used by criminals, and whose only purpose is to kill or maim another human being.

The NRA had opposed the measure by arguing that a ban on KTWs would effectively ban some hunting ammunition that might, when fired from certain handguns, penetrate a Kevlar vest. The types of sports-shooting handguns cited by the NRA are not the short-barreled kind practical for street crime. The bill would not restrict popular sporting ammunition that does not fit the "cop-killer" category.

Good support for the now-NRA-backed bill is expected in the House. We strongly commend it to Reps. Guy A. Vander Jagt, R-Luther, and Mark D. Siljander, R-Three River, urging them to keep in mind the threat of law officers whose daily and dangerous job it is to protect the public. As we have said before, the police need all the help we—and the law—can give them.●

OCEAN DAY AND YEAR OF THE OCEAN

HON. JOEL PRITCHARD

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Speaker, on March 8, 1984, our late colleague and ranking minority member on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, the Honorable Edwin B. Forsythe, introduced legislation declaring July 1, 1984 as Ocean Day, and July 1984 to June 1985 as the Year of the Ocean. This joint resolution represented the culmination of over a year's effort to focus national attention on the value of our ocean and coastal resources.

Representative Forsythe first introduced the idea of Ocean Day during his speech before the Coastal States Organization in June 1983. Mr. Forsythe had envisioned Ocean Day as a 1-day celebration designed to involve those who use the ocean and coastal resources and those who care about the ocean, in a united effort to reawaken Americans to the benefits and potential uses of this resource.

Ocean Day is an integral part of the Year of the Ocean, a year dedicated to increasing our understanding of the ocean in order to emphasize our need to develop ocean and coastal resources wisely so that we may reap fully the benefit the ocean can provide. In Washington, DC, and in cities and towns all over the country, activities are now being planned in which the general public can participate and enjoy the benefits of the oceans. In some cases, traditional events conducted in communities already fit into the celebration theme. In other cases, new celebration activities have been encouraged in recognition of the Day of the Ocean.

During his lifetime, Mr. Forsythe worked diligently to strike a balance between ocean and coastal resource development goals and resource protection. These commemorative occasions personify the philosophy and concern that Mr. Forsythe shared with all of us about the significant value of ocean and coastal resources to our society and economy. The activities during the Year of the Ocean will help the Nation recognize these specific contributions of ocean and identify new opportunities. It will also help define issues and priorities as the United States moves toward a new era of greater ocean potential and development. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution and honor the memory of the late Congressman who worked tirelessly to help our Nation realize the full potential value of ocean resources.●

PHARMACISTS CAN BE PROTECTED FROM VIOLENCE AND THEFT

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, just a few weeks ago the President signed into law the Controlled Substances Registrant Protection Act of 1984. This was a significant achievement and the result of years of legislative effort—an effort which was consistently supported by an overwhelming majority of the House.

The June issue of American Druggist included an article by my good friend and colleague, the distinguished chairman of the Crime Subcommittee, BILL HUGHES. I am pleased to share a condensed version of this article with my colleagues, as it highlights the extensive efforts which were necessary to achieve enactment of this long sought after goal—protection for our pharmacists and all DEA registrants from drug dealers seeking a quick supply of drugs at gunpoint.

[From the American Druggist, June 1984]

PHARMACISTS CAN BE PROTECTED FROM VIOLENCE AND THEFT

(By Representative William J. Hughes)

I am grateful to the editors of American Druggist for inviting me to write about the legislation to protect pharmacists and other controlled substances registrants from robbery and burglary.

I am pleased to report that on May 8, 1984, the U.S. House of Representatives unanimously passed S. 422 as amended by H.R. 5222, The Controlled Substances Registrant Protection Act of 1984, which I sponsored. Final action, at this writing, is expected soon.

This bill adds three new crimes to Federal law prohibiting the robbery, burglary or a consipiracy to commit robbery or burglary involving controlled substances.

BACKGROUND

The Controlled Substances Act (1970) created a comprehensive scheme for regulating the legitimate distribution of certain drugs in order to prevent their improper distribution (manufacturers, distributors, pharmacies, hospitals, physicians, podiatrists, veterinarians and importers and exporters) to register with the Attorney General. The Attorney General's functions under the Act are carried out by the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The effective regulation of the commerce in controlled substances has resulted in very high prices for the drugs on the black market. As a consequence, theft of controlled substances from registrants has become a common yet serious problem. Although burglary and robbery of controlled substance registrants declined in 1982, it has been extremely serious, with between 5,000 and 6,000 such crimes annually between 1977 and 1981.

The frequency of these crimes has terrorized the community of dispensing pharmacists. Some pharmacists have ceased to carry drugs that are highly desired on the black market, although this interferes with their patients' ability to obtain necessary medicine. This has a serious potential to impede the delivery of health care in many communities around the nation.

HYDE BILL

As the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime, I have oversight responsibility on the activities of the Drug Enforcement Administration, and our nation's effort to combat drug abuse, which is one of the most important factors in the commission of crime in the country.

Early in this Congress, one of the first issues addressed by the Subcommittee on Crime was consideration of legislation to make robbery of pharmacies a separate Federal crime. At the time of our hearing on April 7, 1983, there were four bills that had been introduced and referred to the Subcommittee, the principal one being H.R. 1255, introduced by Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R.-Ill.), an outstanding member of the House Judiciary Committee. Mr. Hyde has been the most effective leader in Congress in the development and consideration of pharmacy crime legislation.

As the lead off witness at that hearing, Mr. Hyde testified that in 1981 one in four warehouses for drug distributors had been attacked for the drugs they contained. He cited 1982 figures from DEA that there were a total of 7,099 thefts from DEA registrants resulting in the taking of 15,573,000 dosage units of drugs. In 996 armed robberies of pharmacies 2,580,000 dosage units of drugs were taken.

TESTIMONY

Trey H. Duke, manager of the Pensacola Division of I.L. Lyons & Company, a wholesale drug distributor located in the Southeast, testified on behalf of the National Wholesale Druggists' Assn. He had been the robbery victim of one Freddie Johnson, who is the prime suspect in the commission of 12 robberies of wholesale drug warehouses between September 1979 and August 1980 in eight states. Although DEA assisted in the capture of Johnson, there were no Federal warrants issued for Johnson, nor was there ever a Federal investigation opened against Johnson despite the aggravated and interstate nature of his offenses.

Sidney Dworkin, at that time chairman of the National Assn of Chain Drug Stores, testified about the extensive Federal regulation of registrants under the Controlled Substances Act. He pointed out that acts of falsified recordkeeping, distributing controlled substances in containers or with labels that fail to comply fully with Federal regulations or which are not properly sealed, or distributing controlled substances in a manner that does not comply with the regulations constitute Federal felonies. For a person to obtain controlled substances from a pharmacist or wholesaler by means of counterfeit or forged prescription or by other misrepresentation or subterfuge is also a Federal felony, he observed. Yet the armed robbery of controlled substances, or the burglary of a pharmacy or drug warehouse is not a specific Federal offense. This he viewed as bitterly ironic.

Pharmacist Roland Galley, testifying on behalf of the American Pharmaceutical Assn., said that the increasing incidence of pharmacy crimes has resulted in the closing of numerous pharmacies. "Truly, it is the community which also suffers, and this problem must be viewed not merely as a law enforcement problem but also as a real and substantial public health problem."

STATE VS. FEDERAL

Dennis J. Roberts, Attorney General of Rhode Island and Robert J. Miller, District Attorney for Clark County, Nevada, testified about State investigations and prosecutions of pharmacy robbery. They observed that often State penalties for armed robbery are much greater than Federal penalties. They pointed out the many advantages that local investigators have over Federal investigators for solving these crimes. They arrive at the scene more quickly and examine evidence before it is disturbed; they interview witnesses on the scene while memories are fresh; often they engage in hot pursuit of fleeing suspects; they have access to a network of informants that is likely to be familiar with the suspect; and they are likely to have investigative files of prior criminal acts by the suspect.

Deputy Assistant Attorney General James Knapp, testifying on behalf of the U.S. Department of Justice, observed that a limitation on Federal prosecutions is important to avoid needless conflict between Federal prosecutors and their State and local counterparts, many of whom fear "case poaching" by Federal officials.

Mr. Knapp pointed out that "most pharmacy robberies do not involve any element which requires Federal intervention." He said that "State and local authorities are in a better position—from the standpoint of resources—to pursue robbery cases than are Federal authorities. * * * Federal authorities can, of course, be helpful in robbery cases, particularly robberies involving interstate travel, organized or sophisticated crime activity, diversion to facilitate major drug trafficking or other aggravating factors. It is in those types of cases, which will not require additional resources, where we foresee the exercise of Federal jurisdiction."

HOBBS ACT

I engaged in a colloquy with the Deputy Assistant Attorney General about the problem the Department of Justice believes that it has in prosecuting pharmacy robberies under the existing Federal law, the Hobbs Act. The law's broad language provides a 20-year prison sentence and a $10,000 fine for "whoever in any way or degree obstructs, delays or affects commerce or the movement of any article or commodity in commerce, by robbery * * * or attempts or conspires so to do, or commits or threatens physical violence to any person or property in furtherance of a plan or purpose to do anything in violation of this section." If any pharmacy in the country were robbed of any drug, there is very little question that the Hobbs Act has been violated.

I urged the Department of Justice to begin prosecuting significant pharmacy robbery cases. If it proved that they were not able to assign sufficient resources to pharmacy robbery or they discovered a technical problem with the Hobbs Act, I asked the Justice Department to notify the Subcommittee, and pledged to provide promptly our help for additional funding or to make necessary legislative changes.

NO ACTION

One of my major concerns as chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime is that in the process of developing the Federal budget we have not provided Federal law enforcement agencies with the necessary manpower to carry out the missions we have given to them. Pharmacists, as experts in matters dealing with drugs, know well that smuggling into the United States, and the illegal manufacture and distribution of drugs here, is a problem that overwhelms the 2,100 Special Agents of the DEA. Throughout the nation, we find that Federal agents decline to investigate or prosecute many large drug cases simply because they do not have the agents or resources.

Early this year I asked the Department of Justice to give me an update on Federal investigation and prosecution on pharmacy robbery. At my request, Deputy Assistant Attorney General James Knapp reported to me on March 6, 1984 that no cases had been brought and explained that the Justice Department would not do so under the authority of the Hobbs Act.

NEW LAW NEEDED

Mr. Knapp did not argue that the Department lacked the agents or the resources but explained the lack of prosecutions as due to the Department's need for a more specific statute. I may be wrong in suspecting that so far the Department has used the lack of a specific statute as an excuse for not taking action against pharmacy crime. I hope that I am wrong on this point. In any event, I concluded that it is necessary to pass promptly a separate pharmacy crime bill to provide the Department of Justice with the specific direction and the tools to bring those cases to court. Six says after this meeting, on March 12, 1984, I introduced the Controlled Substance Registrant Protection Act, H.R. 5105, to provide for Federal jurisdiction over the significant cases of robbery and burglary involving controlled substances.

On March 21, 1984, the Crime Subcommittee approved the legislation and reported it to the full Committee on the Judiciary, with several amendments. It was given a new number, H.R. 5222. On March 27, 1984, the Committee approved the bill by an overwhelming voice vote, and the next week, April 2, 1984, it was passed by the House of Representatives unanimously.

The Senate had passed its pharmacy crime bill, S. 422, just a few weeks earlier, in February 23, 1984. After the House passed H.R. 5222, I took steps to work out the differences between the two bills. The principal difference was between the House approach of traditional limited Federal jurisdiction, and a novel Senate approach requiring headquarters review of all pharmacy crime prosecutions by the Department of Justice in Washington. The Subcommittee on Crime has found that such a review process has worked very poorly in the past by preventing U.S. Attorneys from bringing meritorious cases. On May 8, 1984, we reached an agreement and I brought about final House action that evening.

PROVISIONS

To trigger a Federal investigation, the bill provides that there must be a robbery or a burglary (or a conspiracy to commit such a crime). Second, the victim (or intended victim) of the crime must be a person registered with the DEA. Third, the case must have some minimal level of significance or impact on interstate commerce.

The legislation sets forth three alternative criteria. Either the replacement value to the person from whom the drugs were taken was at least $500; or the offender traveled in interstate or foreign commerce or used any facility in interstate or foreign commerce to facilitate the commission of the offense; or a person other than the offender was killed or suffered significant bodily injury as a result of the offense.

I think these criteria will cover much of the serious pharmacy crime. They will serve to focus scarce Federal resources on the most significant cases and will better enable Federal authorities to assist States.

BALANCE NECESSARY

We need sufficient numbers of significant Federal prosecutions to send a clear signal to the criminal element that pharmacy robbery will trigger Federal prosecution. This type of Federal involvement is very important, but we need to keep the balance between Federal and State authorities because State authorities must remain the primary prosecutors of street crimes such as pharmacy robbery and burglary.

The FBI and the DEA together have less than 20,000 agents throughout the world. Yet in 1982, there were over 400,000 sworn police officers in State and local law enforcement agencies. Federal authorities cannot investigate and prosecute every robbery and burglary of controlled substances because of their very limited resources.

Federal resources are inadequate to pursue every case in long established areas such as bank robbery. Although there were 6,597 bank robberies in the United States in 1982, only 1,324 were investigated and prosecuted by Federal law enforcement authorities, roughly 20 per cent of the cases. I have worked consistently to obtain additional resources for Federal law enforcement agencies so that we can be a better partner to the States in fighting crime.

Federal resources are a small part of the nation's total law enforcement effort. They need to be directed to the most appropriate cases, and that decision is best made, using Congressional guidance, by the U.S. Attorneys around the nation. Each U.S. Attorney, in cooperation with state law enforcement officials, can determine which authority can most effectively investigate and prosecute pharmacy robbery cases.

The jurisdictional limits included in H.R. 5222 and S. 422 as amended are designed to maximize the protection of pharmacists and other registrants within the traditional structure of Federal and State law enforcement responsibilities and within the limits of what can be accomplished with the resources and personnel available.

SUPPORT

The editors of American Druggist have done an outstanding job of presenting this issue to the pharmacy community. By educating the pharmacy community, they have helped to create the support that has resulted in the development and passage of the Controlled Substance Registrant Protection Act.

The professional pharmacy community and trade associations, such as APhA, NACDS, NWDA and others, have offered their substantial expertise in making valuable suggestions that have improved this legislation.

Pharmacy is one of the most important and trusted professions in America. I believe that the Controlled Substance Registrant Protection Act of 1984 will help to protect our nation's pharmacists and their employees from the potential of violence and theft. I believe that cutting down on robbery and burglary will go a long way toward reducing the availability of drugs to addicts and will substantially help our whole nation fight drug abuse and its attendant crime.●

TRIBUTE TO HOMESTAKE MINING CO.

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend Homestake Mining Co.'s enlightened approach to the development of the McLaughlin mining project in northern California.

Homestake is to be commended for coordinating its plans to develop the mine with every faction of the affected communities, both in the immediate area and downstream.

Homestake has gone beyond complying with the letter of the law: it has sought to comply with the law's spirit as well. Homestake Mining has been sensitive to the concerns of local environmentalists and has shown a true commitment and understanding of the values of conservation.

As demonstrated by a recent letter to the Yolo County Planning Commission written by the chairman of the Yolano Group of the Mother Lode Chapter of the Sierra Club, environmentalists have also recognized Homestake's dedication and commitment to ensuring that the McLaughlin mine is built and operated in the most environmentally safe manner possible. Wrote Ada Merhoff, the conservation chair of the Yolano Group:

> We would be remiss if we did not publically state our feeling that Homestake Mining Co. is to be commended for its willingness to accommodate the particular concerns of the interested public, and for its efforts to establish an environmentally sound mining operation here. Such cooperation from a large mining company is noteworthy and deserves due credit.

Homestake is an example of the right way to develop mining property. It is an example of the kind of cooperation and responsiveness that I hope will serve as the standard for companies pursuing a similar endeavor in the future.●

CREIGHTON UNIVERSITY COMMENDED

HON. HAL DAUB

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, this summer commemorates the 10th anniversary of Creighton University's exemplary Special Services Progam for low-income and disadvantaged students. This program is designed to facilitate the education of talented individuals who have not previously excelled in school because of financial difficulties or inadequate preparation.

It is a distinct privilege to commend the Special Services Program that has made higher education a reality for sectors of our society that have traditionally been excluded. This effort has been exemplified by the establishment of scholarship funds and providing university facilities for such programs as New Careers, Upward Bound, National Youth Sports Program, Special Health Careers Opportunity Program, and Comprehensive Employment and Training Agency Summer Program.

Since its inception in 1878, Creighton University has provided outstanding education and conferred degrees upon more than 37,500 students. Today, 32,000 alumni are serving communities throughout the Nation. Creighton University is an independent, Catholic university. Operated by the Jesuit Fathers, it had a spring 1984 enrollment of 5,907. The university enrolls students in the college of arts and science, the nationally accredited college of business administration, the graduate school, university college, and lifelong learning center, summer sessions, and schools of nursing, medicine, law, pharmacy, and allied health professions, and dentistry.

Students come to Creighton University with outstanding credentials and leave with exceptional skills. The average college entrance test score of incoming students at Creighton is approximately 25 percent higher than the national average. The average score of students competing in varsity intercollegiate athletics at Creighton is nearly as high as the general student body, well above the national norm.

During the past decade, more than 90 percent of the athletes who completed their eligibility at Creighton University have received degrees. And, additionally, a significant number received advanced degrees in law, medicine, dentistry, and other professional areas.

Creighton graduates include presidents of America's largest companies, State supreme court justices, network journalists, and minorities who have attained high ranks in government. Creighton scholars are regularly awarded such prestigious academic recognition as the Harry S. Truman Scholarship, earn top scores on national licensing examinations, and compete successfully in national competitions.

It is imperative that our education institutions do not displace their inherent responsibility to provide educational services to all sectors of our society. As the cost of higher education has escalated across the Nation, Creighton University has not lost sight of this goal to provide educational opportunities. Creighton University truly continues the Jesuit tradition of excellence in education and has been an integral part of the Omaha and Nebraska community and the country as well.

I am proud to recognize their outstanding achievements.●

ON THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A SELECT COMMITTEE ON CITIES

HON. WILLIAM J. COYNE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a resolution calling on the House to establish a Select Committee on Cities.

I join 51 of my colleagues in presenting this resolution to the House for a very pressing reason. While 74 percent of our population is urban, we in the Congress are often unable to address squarely the problems of large-, medium-, and small-sized cities. This is because our committee system, while functional enough in most instances, is structured in such a way that the necessary debate on urban policy rarely takes place.

Those of us who represent districts with urban areas know well enough the problems which must be resolved. Deterioration of housing stock and infrastructure is beginning to outpace our limited preservation efforts. Poorly financed public transportation leads to overuse of our city streets. Crumbling water and sewer lines tax the ability of local governments to deliver essential services.

The fiscal problems of cities, I would remind my colleagues, are not confined to urban areas. A recent survey of 299 cities by the Joint Economic Committee made this observation:

> The largest percentage increases in cities reporting deficits occurred in the medium and large categories, with increases of 36 percent and 35 percent, respectively. In 1982, 47 percent of medium cities and 40 percent of large cities experienced deficits. By contrast, several past surveys found the largest proportion of deficits in the largest city category, while the smallest proportion usually was found in the medium category. It is risky to draw trends from one year's data, but these results may indicate that a new group of fiscally troubled cities is emerging.

When cities, large or small, turn to the Congress for assistance, they must, of necessity, face an array of committees. Certain aspects of housing fall under the Banking Committee, while other critical portions of the Federal housing effort fall under the Ways and Means Committee. Mass transit falls under Public Works and Transportation, employment under Education and Labor, urban parks under Interior, and so on.

When it comes to writing laws, I am among those who firmly believe that those committees which possess the technical expertise and the institutional history to carry out the task should be the legislative vehicles. But when it comes to developing a national urban policy to target our Federal resources where they do the most good, I believe we can improve our effort.

Let me cite a couple of examples of ways we could improve the work of this Congress when it comes to urban issues.

In the area of small business development in depressed neighborhoods, we have the excellent work of the Small Business Committee on which to draw. Its analysis of the capital needs of small business has been superb, as have been the legislative recommendations of the committee to this House. Because of the restrictions of the congressional process, however, the committee is unable to address adequately the problems each of us know have a direct impact on the development of small urban businesses. How does area crime, for example, effect small business development? How does the Tax Code influence business development in our cities?

The same somewhat scattered approach holds true in our attempts to develop a rational housing policy. As a member of the House Banking Committee, I know the contributions to housing that committee has made. But struggle though we might to address, for example, the shortage of low and moderate income housing in urban areas, we deal with only part of the picture. The Congress acts in a somewhat disjointed manner on a critical part of Federal housing effort; specifically, tax policy. When we do act on housing tax policy, members of the Banking Committee, the designated experts on housing under our committee system, have little to say about what we do.

In each of our capable committees which deal with various urban issues, we develop a sense of the existing problems and, on occasion, we even touch on a few solutions. In no instance, however, do we look at the big picture, nor do we study the urban condition in a manner which could lead to comprehensive proposals for national action.

That is the reason why the sponsors of this resolution, members of both parties representing a variety of political philosophies, are proposing a Select Committee on Cities. The committee's life would be 2 years and, unlike most committees, it would have no legislative jurisdiction. Rather than determine how much money to spend and what to spend it on, the select committee would be charged with examining the impact of Federal programs and policies on cities, making such recommendations as may be necessary to the House. Funding for the committee would be minimal and, in any case, would be available only after a separate vote on a funding resolution reported by the Committee on House Administration.

Those of us with an urban agenda recognize the need for a committee which specializes in cities. Let me now turn to those who may not, on initial observation, share that perception nor appreciate that need.

There are those who say that the Federal commitment to cities has not changed all that significantly in recent years, and that there is no real need to study the nature and size of that commitment.

This argument is easily challenged by a look at the record. We have heard much since 1981 about budget cutbacks, but not enough, I would suggest, to appreciate the magnitude in the reduction of urban aid. Since fiscal year 1980, the drop in grants to State and local government, after accounting for inflation, has been nearly 50 percent. The U.S. Conference of Mayors recently noted what could happen if this trend continues:

> The result of additional reductions in state and local grants will be further layoffs, service cuts and tax increases at the local level and continued inability of cities to meet the basic needs of their citizens. These problems pervade cities of all sizes and geographic regions.

The Mayors' Conference has provided some useful figures which dramatically show how the portion of the federal budget devoted to state and local governments has declined, and is expected to decline:

There are others whose lack of support for this initiative stems, they say, from a failure to perceive a clearly defined purpose for a Select Committee on Cities.

The resolution clearly states the purpose of the select committee. Under title II, the committee is required to study the impact of Federal programs on urban areas. Among the areas of study directed by the resolution are the needs of our urban infrastructure, the policies and practices of training and retraining programs in other nations which may be applicable in our cities, and aspects of our Federal Tax Code which influence urban development. In addition, the committee is charged with studying the Marshall plan for rebuilding postwar Europe to determine whether such an effort might work in the cities of America.

Some would suggest that a Select Committee on Cities could tilt toward the problems of large cities, overlooking the obstacles faced by small- and medium-sized municipalities.

As the mayors of small- and medium-sized towns know, the problems faced by those towns, while different in nature and scope from those of big cities, are nonetheless persistent and occasionally baffling. For this reason, the resolution for a Select Committee on Cities has drawn the endorsement of the mayors not only of cities such as New York, New Orleans, and Washington, DC, but also of Worcester, MA, Riverside, CA, and Warren, MI. Mayors in small-, medium-, and large-sized cities are ready to work with a special congressional panel on cities.

Mr. Speaker, as we wrestle with programs to bring about full employment, we are urged to look to the future as we develop job programs. In this context, the words "growth industry" are bandied about with some frequency. I would submit that the rebuilding of our cities is one of the greatest "growth industries" this Nation can undertake between now and the end of this century. The agenda needs to be set for rebuilding our housing, repairing our streets and sewers, training the growing army of unemployed youth, and encouraging investment in areas which need it the most. To begin the process of setting the agenda, this House needs to create a Select Committee on Cities. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring the resolution which we have introduced today, a summary of which follows in the RECORD. I would also like to include at this point letters of endorsement from the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the National League of Cities, and the Pennsylvania League of Cities.

UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF MAYORS,
Washington, DC, April 6, 1984.

Hon. WILLIAM COYNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN COYNE: The U.S. Conference of Mayors fully supports your recommendation to create a Select Committee on Cities in the House of Representatives.

Such a select committee could play an important role in focusing attention on the problems of urban areas and exploring potential solutions to those problems.

The trends affecting urban areas—intergovernmental revenue shifts, cutbacks in urban and low-income programs, recent program changes and the increasing federal reliance on block grants as a mechanism for channeling aid—could all be more fully analyzed by a Select Committee on Cities. It is unfortunate that many of the continuing problem of cities, including high unemployment, high housing costs, inadequate city resources to meet the needs of the poor, growing populations of hungry, homeless and service dependent families, and deteriorating infrastructure, are all matters which have received little programmatic response from the Congress. One reason may be that most urban issues fall within the jurisdiction of more than one committee, which sometimes results in haphazard, disjointed, and fragmented Congressional responses.

While a Subcommittee on the Cities would have no legislative authority, still the creation of such a committee would provide a framework for the analysis and examination of urban problems.

As you know, at one time there was a Subcommittee on the City established within the House Banking Committee. This Subcommittee provided a forum for the views of city, state and federal officials on the unique problems of our large urban areas. The Conference of Mayors is delighted that you are seeking to create a similar institutional mechanism—of vital importance for the three-fourths of our citizens who live in urban areas.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. GUNTHER,
Executive Director.

NATIONAL LEAGUE OF CITIES,
Washington, DC, March 27, 1984.

Hon. WILLIAM J. COYNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN COYNE: This is in reply to your recent letter asking our support for your proposal to establish a Select Committee on Cities in the House of Representatives.

The National League of Cities supports your proposal. Establishment of such a Select Committee would be timely and appropriate, with benefits for both Federal and city governments. The cumulative and continuing impacts of the recent recession, federal and state funding cutbacks, and such emerging problems as antitrust liability have placed cities in a precarious position. Increasingly on their own, they are less and less able to meet the constantly growing needs of their citizens for improved social services. At the same time, they are forced to neglect the maintenance of the physical infrastructure that is the basis for urban living, as well as for balanced economic growth.

A Select Committee on Cities would have important benefits. It could focus on the overriding problems of urban areas, prioritize needs, and suggest comprehensive approaches. It could highlight and suggest solutions for the problems caused by the fragmented approach that characterizes federal policies for urban areas. And it could give long overdue attention to the uneven impact of macroeconomic policies on cities across the country.

A Select Committee on Cities need not interfere with the program jurisdiction of any existing House committee. Its major task should be to conduct, as your resolution states, "a full and complete examination of the impact of Federal Government programs and policies on American cities."

Please let me know if we can provide you with any assistance in this effort.

Sincerely,

ALAN BEALS,
Executive Director.

PENNSYLVANIA LEAGUE OF CITIES,
Harrisburg, PA, March 30, 1984.

Representative WILLIAM COYNE,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN COYNE: The Pennsylvania League of Cities is fully supportive of your effort to create a Select Committee on Cities. Cities in Pennsylvania are faced with fiscal, social and economical pressures which place severe restrictions on their ability to provide municipal services to residents, business, health, cultural and educational institutions.

The problems of Pennsylvania's cities are similar to those difficulties faced by cities across our Nation. Through the appointment of such a committee we believe a concerted effort would be developed to address these difficulties.

The Pennsylvania League of Cities looks forward to the establishment of a Select Committee on Cities by the 98th Congress.

Best personal regards.

Sincerely,

JOHN A. GARNER, Jr.,
Executive Director.●

TRIBUTE TO BETTIE LaMOTTE

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, today marks the end of a long and distinguished career in Congress for Ms. Bettie J. LaMotte of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee staff.

Ms. LaMotte is retiring to the mountains of West Virginia and I would like to take just a few minutes to commend her service and wish her well.

For the past 11 years she served the Post Office and Civil Service Committee faithfully and well. I can think of no more appropriate accolade than to say that in every sense of the word she has been a professional in her work. The quality of her work has always been exemplary. And she has accepted every assignment with alacrity. She has approached every job—large and small—with the kind of professionalism that is so important and so appreciated in Congress.

She began her career in the House 20 years ago with Congressman Johnny Walker of New Mexico. Later she moved to the office of Congressman Richard White of Texas and then to the staff of the Subcommittee on Census and Statistics when he assumed the chair. In 1975 she moved with Congressman White to the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits. She started working for the full committee staff in 1977 as a secretary. Later she was promoted to case worker and then to computer manager.

For myself and all of those on the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I wish Bettie and her husband Cal a happy and healthy retirement. It is well earned.●

HOUSE FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES RESOLUTION

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the House Fair Employment Practices Resolution. The purpose of the bill is to implement the Rules of the House of Representatives that prohibit a Member of Congress, or an officer or employee of the House from engaging in employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. The bill would also require a study of pay equity among House employees.

This legislation would provide employees of the House with protection against employment discrimination equal to that provided other employees under title VII of the Civil Rights Act and under the Equal Pay Act of 1963. The House Fair Employment Practices Resolution not only provides employees with essential protections against discrimination, but also takes into consideration the unique characteristics of the House of Representatives as an institution. The proposed legislation does not infringe upon the rights of Representatives to select staff based upon legitimate criteria related to job performance, nor does it prevent them from considering geographical, political, or other legitimate factors.

In 1976, Congressman MORRIS UDALL, Congressman CHARLIE ROSE and I created the House Fair Employment Practices Committee. This committee was, and still is, a voluntary ad hoc committee. A member signs the agreement that he or she will not discriminate on the basis of race, sex, religion, national origin, age, or physical handicapping condition. If an employee feels he or she has been the victim of discrimination, then the employee brings the grievance before the ad hoc committee which is made up of three Members of Congress and three staff members.

I don't think this mechanism is strong enough. We must move Congress beyond the voluntary agreement and on to binding legislation. This resolution would set up a grievance procedure that applied to all Members of Congress, not just those that signed the agreement, who are least likely to discriminate anyway.

A detailed grievance procedure incorporated into the House rules provides the missing teeth to enforce the antidiscrimination language already in the House Rules—clause 9 of rule XLIII and clause 6(a)(3)(A) of rule XI.

I would like to remind my colleagues of the 1979 Supreme Court decision Davis against Passman. In that decision, the court held that the fifth amendment gives congressional employees the right to sue in Federal court for damages resulting from discrimination by their employers. The Court also held that money damages would be a proper remedy in discrimination cases.

The Court's ruling was based, in part, on the fact that Congress did not have a mechanism to implement the language in the House rules prohibiting, in the Davis case, sex discrimination. Thus, when Shirley Davis believed her constitutional rights had been violated, she had no form of redress other than the Federal courts. The House still lacks a means to remedy employment discrimination.

This legislation fills that void.

Passage of this legislation would show that Congress does not mean to exempt itself from laws it passes for the private sector. Arguments to include Congress under title VII has focused on the constitutional questions of separation of powers. We do not want the executive branch coming in to examine congressional operations. At the same time, we want to be fair to our employees. This resolution allows us to accomplish both objectives.

The resolution is virtually the same as one I introduced in 1979. I have added one provision to require a study of discriminatory wage setting practices of House employees. This language parallels language in H.R. 5680 which provides for a study of pay equity in the executive branch and which passed the House yesterday. This provision is consistent with the overall purpose of the resolution: to provide employees of the House with the same level of protection against employment discrimination which other employees receive.

Below is a synopsis of the legislation:

PROVISIONS OF THE HOUSE FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES ACT

1. Fair Employment Relations Board: The board consists of six members appointed from the private sector by the House majority and minority parties. The Board would hear discrimination complaints and supervise the Fair Employment Relations Office. Members of the Board cannot be former House employees or former Members of Congress.

2. Fair Employment Relations Office: The Office would process discrimination complaints and study present House personnel practices, publish statistical data on salaries, etc., and make recommendations for the improvement of hiring and recruitment practices. The Office would also conduct an ongoing study of pay equity among employees of the House.

3. Due Process Procedure for House Employees:

(a) Counseling: Provides for counseling if an employee or job applicant feels he/she is or has been discriminated against (20-day time limit).

(b) Informal Complaint: Given an individual an opportunity to file an informal complaint after the counseling period. The Director would look into the complaint to determine whether or not there might have been discrimination. If the Director's report states that there is no evidence of discrimination, the case is closed unless the complainant appeals to the Board to overturn the Director's report (45-day time limit).

If the Director's report states discrimination was probable, the Director has been unsuccessful at resolving the complaint, and the Board rules contrary to the Director's report, the individual may file a formal complaint (30-day time limit).

(c) Formal Complaint: Provides an opportunity for a hearing. A hearing examiner would hear the case and make a recommendation to the Board. The Board would then determine the disposition of the complaint, including remedies (60 days).

(d) Appeal to the Ethics Committee: Allows for either party to appeal to the Ethics Committee beyond the Board's recommendations (60-day time limit).

Cost Factor: The Congressional Budget Office has estimated the cost of this resolution to be, at a maximum, $230,000 on an annual basis.●

U.S. POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, as the country turns its attention to the business of political conventions and talk of a summit with the Soviets, there is a lull in the debate over U.S. policy in Central America. It is a welcome respite and one that offers the hope that some measure of peace and stability can be restored to the region. President Duarte of El Salvador is busy charting the course of Central America's newest Democracy while seeking to curb the violence of the left and the right. The Reagan administration and the Sandinistas of Nicaragua are delicately engaged in talks to ease tensions between the two countries. Meanwhile, the Contadora nations are quietly continuing their efforts to create a regional solution to Central America's problems. And Congress, right or wrong, has finally settled on a policy of support for El Salvador and a cutoff in aid to the Contras.

There is reason to be cautiously optimistic about the situation in Central America. In El Salvador, the army has performed admirably and now has the guerrillas on the run. Roberto d'Aubuisson, the defeated presidential candidate, has so far not carried out his threats to contest Mr. Duarte's election. A verdict was recently returned in the case of the five former National Guardsmen accused of murdering four American nuns in 1980. And Mr. Duarte, after a triumphant visit to Washington in the wake of his election, won pledges of support from the Congress. While the leftist insurgency, human rights abuses, and poverty still pose enormous problems in El Salvador, all things considered, there is reason to believe that conditions will begin to improve in that war-torn country.

There is also some cause to be encouraged by the situation vis-a-vis Nicaragua. Having applied the "stick" to the Sandinistas, the administration has shown it is willing to offer the "carrot," evident in Mr. Shultz' surprise visit to Managua and Harry Shlaudeman's talks with the Nicaraguan Deputy Foreign Minister in Mexico. In time, agreement could be reached since each side has something to gain from these talks. Nicaragua wants the United States to halt its aid to the Contras and end its economic sanctions. The United States, in turn, is demanding that the Sandinistas cool their revolutionary zeal by halting aid to the Salvadoran rebels, expelling their Soviet military advisers, and honoring their pledge to establish a democratic government. Progress in these talks may strengthen the efforts of the Contadora Group to establish a regional peace plan that all can agree on.

Back in Washington, Congress has decided that, for now, it will not fund the Contras' war against the Sandinistas, a move that I happen to disagree with. Nevertheless, this should ease Nicaragua's fears and encourage them to make concessions of their own. However, should the Sandinistas instead choose to continue their march toward a militarized, totalitarian system with close ties to the Soviets, hopes for a regional solution would be dashed. It is doubtful that the United States and the nations of Central America will tolerate the further militarization of Nicaragua and the creation of another Soviet proxy in this hemisphere. Thus, the talks quietly going on in Mexico with the Sandinistas represent a crossroads. The present lull is either the start of a genuine peace process or the calm before the storm. Let us hope that each side recognizes the significance of this moment in history since much is at stake.●

SOLVENCY OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY SYSTEM

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, in March 1983 when the House of Representatives was debating H.R. 1900, legislation to secure the solvency of the Social Security System, I reminded my colleagues in Congress of the need to ensure that the passage of this legislation, which was largely drafted from the recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security, would not solidify the Social Security System at the expense of the Federal Civil Service Retirement System. I stated at that time that I felt it was imperative for Congress to carefully analyze the impact these proposals, as well as the other changes that had been implemented, would have on the Federal Civil Service Retirement System.

I am again urging Congress to examine the impact that various legislative changes, which have been made and which have been proposed, will have on the Federal Civil Service Retirement System. The Commission on Social Security was established to suggest ways to revise that system in order to prevent the projected insolvency. The Social Security Amendments Act was passed and the future of retirees who depend on that system is secure for the time being.

It is now being estimated that there are inadequate resources in the Civil Service Retirement System today to meet "accrued liabilities," or future benefit obligations, to current employees contributing to the system. OPM figures indicate that the current unfunded liability for the Civil Service Retirement Fund stands at $600 billion. In light of this projected unfunded liability, I believe it is imperative that a Federal Retirement System Commission be established to analyze and suggest ways of solving the problems facing the Federal retirement system. The impact of proposed changes must be carefully analyzed and future costs must be controlled.

The Government is obligated to provide a retirement system to those who had contributed, and are contributing, to the Social Security System. We have assured the future of this system, to the best of our ability, by the passage of H.R. 1900. By the same token, the Government has promised its Federal employees a secure retirement through the establishment of the Civil Service Retirement System. Is it not only equitable that we establish a similar commission to give these individuals the assurance that they can be guaranteed a retirement income, as we promised? It is necessary to establish this commission to analyze and suggest ways of solving the problems facing the Civil Service Retirement System. We should not wait until the problem of insolvency of this system is upon us. We should act with foresight and establish a National Commission on the Civil Service Retirement System.●

GENERAL MOTORS' SAFETY PROPOSAL

HON. BOB CARR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, in July, during the upcoming recess, the U.S. Department of Transportation will be announcing yet another decision in the 15-year debate on passive restraints. I have an abiding interest in the outcome of this rulemaking process, and had the opportunity to testify at the DOT's hearing on this matter last December.

In one of the most important developments in this long running debate, the General Motors Corp. recently issued an innovative and thought-provoking new proposal which deserves serious and detailed consideration by the Department and Secretary Dole.

Specifically, GM is advocating that the debate on the important issue of reducing occupant crash fatalities and injuries move away from almost exclusive consideration of add-on safety devices, such as the controversial airbag system or automatic seatbelts not unlike the compulsive starter interlock system the Congress specifically rejected several years ago. Instead, GM proposes that a new standard be developed for safety features—such as improved vehicle structures, and changes to steering wheels, columns, door locks, and hinges. Changes of this kind would provide increased protection not only to belted occupants but also to the 85 percent of the people who are customarily unbelted.

GM believes that this new focus on built-in safety for the unrestrained occupant will add a new dimension to occupant protection. Even with mandatory seatbelt laws in effect, occupants will receive an additional level of protection through these interior design improvements. The reason for this focus on the unrestrained occupant is the unfortunate fact that only about 15 percent of occupants use available seatbelt systems or passive restraints when offered by vehicle manufacturers.

A key element of the GM proposal is the expectation that a passive restraint-only rule, if issued by DOT, would be met by most manufacturers with detachable automatic seatbelts, which, according to NHTSA estimates, would probably not increase overall seatbelt usage by more than 5 percent. Thus, GM suggests a program that will reach 17 times as many vehicle occupants as a passive belt system, while also providing added protection to those who do take steps to protect themselves by wearing available belt systems.

The concept of built-in safety, of the friendly car interior embodied in this far-reaching GM proposal, is already being implemented with significant success in GM production vehicles, including the popular new Pontiac Fiero, which is manufactured in my district. When tested by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration under the new care assessment program, the Fiero established an all-time record for the lowest head injury criteria reading for a belted crash test dummy in a 35-mile-per-hour barrier crash.

The Fiero had similar excellent results in GM tests with unrestrained crash test dummies in a 30-mile-per-hour test. Significantly, this test yielded results which were below the requirements for the passive restraint standard, even though the dummies were not restrained.

The design improvement which would result from the new standard embodied in the General Motors proposal can bring about significant reductions in traffic fatalities and injuries. Importantly, these reductions can occur without requiring unnecessary expenditures which would increase vehicle costs and thereby run the risk of negating the recent sales surge which has resulted in the recall of thousands of auto industry workers in my State and many others.

The GM proposal is constructive and deserves the serious consideration of the Secretary of Transportation, the administration and the Congress in the weeks ahead.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the GM announcement of its proposal to DOT be included in the RECORD after my remarks.

DETROIT.—General Motors proposed a new alternative today in the long-running air bag debate, to allow manufacturers to use conventional manual belts—if the cars themselves provide significant occupant protection even when the belts are not fastened.

Responding to the Department of Transportation's [DOT] request for additional comments on passive restraints, GM reiterated its position that mandatory belt use laws would be the quickest and most cost effective way of improving highway safety. But, the company said, "we believe that even with mandatory belt use laws in effect, additional occupant protection can be achieved most effectively through interior design improvements."

GM said the strategy it was proposing would "benefit both belted and unbelted occupants and encourage innovation in a wider variety of occupant protection." Improved "built-in" crash protection mainly would be achieved by designing and manufacturing more crashworthy vehicle structures and more friendly interiors, the company said.

The key element in GM's alternative is the strengthening of the regulation for conventional manual belts so that cars equipped with them pass barrier crash tests at 25 mph with an unbelted Hybrid III dummy. GM also proposed that manufacturers choosing this belt option must also pass a 30 mph barrier crash test requirement with the belts fastened. Both of these requirements are new and together, with the Hybrid III dummy, will provide additional safety to motorists.

In a covering letter to Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole, Dr. Betsy Ancker-Johnson, head of GM's Environmental Activities Staff, said, "We recognize that this initial step (25 mph barrier test requirements) for unfastened manual belts would not yield the level of individual protection" that would be realized by those few additional motorists who might use automatic belts. But she said the total benefits to society would be far greater.

Dr. Ancker-Johnson said GM agreed with NHTSA's judgment that it is uncertain whether separable automatic belts would increase belt usage by even 5 percentage points. "However, if we add passive protection for the motorists who do not fasten manual belts, we're sure that at least 85 percent of the motorists will benefit—all those who are unbelted," she argued.

In its formal submission to NHTSA, GM said it believed cars that could pass the 25 mph unbelted test with the Hybrid III dummy would reduce highway deaths and injuries by about 12 percent. This would be comparable to an increase in belt use from about the current 15 percent to 36 percent, the company said.

"This is far beyond any level that can be depended upon by the installation of automatic belts," it added.

GM added that technologies developed to meet the 25 mph unbuckled frontal crash test could be applied to improved protection in side, rear and rollover accidents. "In time, when all these areas have been addressed, we believe that highway injuries and deaths can be reduced by 25 percent." GM added such a dramatic improvement would be comparable to faithful belt use by about 65 percent of all motorists.

"With the adoption of our proposal, we envision a U.S. passenger car fleet that in time will offer a wide variety of occupant protection systems. Initially, manufacturers of most cars will likely comply by installing automatic belts. However, the proposed 25 mph alternative should spur manufacturers to develop improved interiors because most manufacturers believe that consumers will not accept automatic belts," GM said.

GM also agreed with NHTSA that small car safety and occupant protection deserves the highest priority, but it did not endorse an alternative proposal to require driver-only airbags in small cars. It said without some reduction in the present 30 mph test requirements, installing airbags in small cars could pose the risk that the rapid deployment of the airbag could cause more injuries to out of position occupants than the accidents themselves in some cases.

"An important added benefit of the strategy we are proposing," GM said, "is that it might very well allow the development of safe supplemental airbag technology for use with manual lap/shoulder belts in small cars."

GM again urged NGTSA to allow the use of the improved Hybrid III dummy in vehicle crash testing. GM, which developed the ten-year-old Hybrid II test dummy, which is now specified, said Hybrid III's more human-like responses make it a more reliable, sophisticated tool for automotive safety development work.

By failing to rule on GM's petition that Hybrid III be allowed, NHTSA could very well delay the development and application of significant safety improvements, the company said.●

IN RECOGNITION OF ATTORNEY JAMES L. PAZOL

HON. LYLE WILLIAMS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. WILLIAMS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to your attention, the outstanding achievements of my constituent, attorney James L. Pazol of Youngstown, OH. REV. JESSE JACKSON'S MORAL OFFENSIVE IN CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, recently I was privileged to travel with Rev. Jesse Jackson to Central America where Reverend Jackson initiated a moral offensive for peace in the Western Hemisphere.

I submit for review statements which came out as a result of that historic visit.

REV. JESSE JACKSON'S STATEMENT, PANAMA CITY, PANAMA, JUNE 23, 1984

Once again, we are glad to be in Panama. This is our second trip to your great nation. In our previous trip here, we were warmly welcomed and graciously hosted by the people and the government of Panama. On that occasion we met in the home of Gen. Omar Torrijos and learned to love and respect your former leader and hero. We visited your schools, preached in your churches, and we learned and shared with your leaders and intellectuals. Then, as now, we were guided and ably prepared for your trip by a native Panamanian, Mr. Cirillio McSween, a Panamanian olympic track hero, who is currently an outstanding and successful businessman in the United States. Mr. McSween was the treasurer for S.C.L.C. under Dr. Martin Luther King. His human rights activity is a source of inspiration.

We have come to Central America to engage in a dialogue about peace. We come to make a fervent appeal for peace. Our last visit here was also a mission for peace. We came here to study the issues involved in the Panama Canal Treaty. We said then that the basis for peace in Panama was justice. It was only just that the Panama Canal treaties were ratified by our congress. After studying the issues for a week, we returned to the United States and testified before the appropriate congressional committees in support of the U.S. ratification of the treaty. Our political leaders heard our pleas and those of many others. They took the prudent course of justice. Hostilities were avoided and peace was maintained. The United States and Panama stood together, and both of our countries won.

We have returned to Panama for the first part of our four nation journey to Central America to urge that we stand together again for peace and justice. We have come to Panama because as one of the four Contadora nations, you are integral to peace in this region. We come to Panama to say that we support the Contadora process not just in word but in deed. We look forward to meeting with your mayor, with government officials, and with the people of Panama.

Muchas Gracias.

MISSION FOR PEACE IN CENTRAL AMERICA: 10 REASONS FOR OUR VISIT

(By Rev. Jesse L. Jackson)

1. Central America is our next door neighbor.

2. I, along with many other North Americans, fear war in this hemisphere. We have seen signs that the war in Central America is escalating. This summer may be our last chance to work for peace before a fall offensive. We are confronting a region beset by a history of repressive governments, abounding poverty, lack of education for all, and disease.

Its people are struggling for self-determination. An escalating military crisis will have many fronts in different countries, but it will be one war—a war that would be more devastating than Viet Nam; a war that would spread like a brush fire in this hemisphere; a war that would tear our own country apart.

Every poll shows that the people of the United States do not want to see our country at war in Central America. At home we would see not only further economic dislocation, but intolerable emotional and psychological conflicts—especially for the young, the black, the poor, the Hispanic American.

The war would come home. Our peoples and cultures overlap with those of all our Southern neighbors. The war would not stop at our borders. Our very blood lines are comingled.

The signs of this war increase: We see the military build-up throughout the region; we see less talk between rival or rebel groups; we see the United States taking side instead of helping to reconcile the conflict; and while the conflict expands, we see no possibility of any military solution or victory.

We cannot let narrow economic interests and the needs of landed gentry dictate our foreign policy.

3. We must study peace options and war consequences. We must listen to the left, the right, the governments of the region, the people of the United States and the people of the region.

4. We must make the Western Hemisphere a war free zone from Canada to Cuba. We must work with all our neighbors to achieve this purpose.

5. We must have diplomatic exchanges with all nations in this hemisphere.

We should recognize the FDR/FMLN as a "legitimate political force," as Mexico and France have.

We should respect the sovereignty of the Nicaraguan people. We should stop financing the guerrillas who invade her border, kill her citizens, and disrupt her economy.

The C.I.A.'s direct involvement in mining the harbors of Nicaragua contravened every principle of international law and was against the will of the American people.

We must break the cycle of pain—of escalating armaments, attack and counter attack and begin to talk.

We must break the cycle and habit of arrogance. We seek to halt the tide of rebellion and revolution in Central America, yet we finance rebels in Afghanistan.

Our nation understands rebellion and revolution. Our own nation was born in a revolution and endured the transition before the call for free elections.

6. We must work toward full normalization of our relationship with Cuba.

7. We must go beyond lip service endorsement of the Contadora leadership and the Contadora approach to the crisis in Central America. They are our allies; they are indigenous; they choose diplomacy over deployment; they advocate economic rather than military aid; and they resist the attempts to analyze the conflict in Central America as primarily a struggle between East and West, between the United States and the Soviet Union. They recognize that the roots of the conflict are internal.

8. We must convince all parties that there is more power in cease fire than in more fire.

9. The international debt crisis has been heightened by soaring U.S. budget deficits and interest rates. The austerity measures imposed by the International Monetary Fund have widened the gap between rich and poor and led to further rebellion throughout the region. The economic crisis causes more and more people who have become hopeless about finding jobs or the means to feed their children in their own lands to flee to ours. Passing the Simpson-

Mazzoli bill will not stop this flight from unbearable conditions. We must find ways of dealing with the international debt crisis and encouraging economic development throughout the region that meets human needs.

10. Our Rainbow Coalition must function beyond conventional politics. We must see stopping the war in Central America as one of our most critical moral tasks, and we must pursue that goal in every way we can. Our present trip seeks to promote greater dialogue and understanding between the people of our own nation and people of Central America. The more we know and understand, the more certain we will be of how to pursue the paths of peace.

We will bring our message home to the American people. We must learn the lessons of Viet Nam. The protests then were too little and too late. The lives, the hopes and aspirations of the Viet Namese people, the bitterness and sorrows of their struggles, remained too foreign to the American people. We can not allow another Viet Nam. We must bring the truth home.

RESULTS OF REV. JESSE JACKSON'S DISCUSSIONS WITH F.D.R.-F.M.L.N. DELEGATION, PANAMA CITY, PANAMA, JUNE 24, 1984

1. Willingness to enter a process of dialogue and negotiation, without any precondition for a political rather than a military solution.

2. Willingness to engage in a dialogue and talks for exploring implementation of a mutual cease fire.

3. Willingness to support and abide by the Contadora process.

4. Willingness to come directly to San Salvador to engage in the above talks, accepting the good offices of the Costa Rican embassy as the venue.

5. Willingness to begin all of the above immediately.

REV. JESSE JACKSON'S STATEMENT, HAVANA, CUBA, JUNE 26, 1984

Let me express my thanks to President Fidel Castro for his kind and gracious welcome to the beautiful nation of Cuba. I, together with my family, staff and invited guests, have been overwhelmed by the warmth and friendliness offered all of us without condition by the people of Cuba. I sincerely wish that all Americans could experience the vibrancy of Cubans and their culture. Moreover, I am hopeful that our visit to the island will help break the cycle of misunderstanding and bring our peoples and our governments closer together so that we can begin to relate to each other as the neighbors that we are.

This afternoon and tonight President Castro and I had a long, detailed, frank and open discussion. With a moral appeal we have urged a moral offensive on ten major issues that move our countries from cold war rhetoric battleground to moral higher ground. We must now seize this moment to make peace possible. Peace and security are indivisible.

1. Normalization of relations.—It is clear that the policy of non-recognition has caused us 25 years of pain and needless misunderstanding. But beyond the psychological scars, this policy has funneled precious resources into the production of arms of destruction. Education, health, jobs, development have all been impeded by such a policy. Our countries can no longer afford the mistakes of the past. We must normalize relations between our countries immediately.

2. Exchange of Ambassadors.—With the full realization that all of what we have appealed for this day would normally be resolved through government-to-government dialogue, we seized the moral initiative to propose that our nations exchange Ambassadors immediately and with no pre-conditions. President Castro has agreed, pending acceptance by the United States.

3. Family Reunification—Immigration.—I conveyed to President Castro the concern of Cuban-American families who have been unable to re-unite with their relatives in Cuba who lacked visas to enter the U.S. We also were cognizant of the U.S. government's desire to resolve the problem of the so-called Excludables, who have been in detention centers in the U.S. since the Mariel boatlift. President Castro expressed the disposition of the Cuban government to immediately enter into a process of negotiation to reach an agreement that will regulate immigration between our two countries and thus facilitate this Reunification of families process and the return to Cuba of those Excludables.

President Castro stated his position that to enter this process it would be needed that the Democrat as well as the Republican Party agree that this matter should not become an electoral issue, being as it is in the best interests of the United States.

4. Visit to Cuban Prison.—As Americans began to hear of our visit with Cuba, we received many inquiries from families who had a loved one in prison in Cuba. We have requested, and President Castro has agreed, that we visit these American prisoners. Tomorrow we will go.

5. Release of American Prisoners.—After extensive discussions, President Castro has agreed to release 22 persons who are American-born citizens. These persons represent substantially all Americans now imprisoned in Cuba. Subject to certain immigration matters, these Americans will accompany our delegation to Washington on Thursday.

6. Previously Released Cubans.—Regarding the issue of Cuban prisoners, we discussed those counter-revolutionary prisoners who reportedly worked for the United States and who have been freed by the Cuban government, but who have not been granted visas by our State Department. We will set in motion immediately a process to make their immigration to the United States possible. President Castro also agreed to allow Andrés Vargas Gómez to leave the country. I also raised the issue of some Cuban nationals who are now in prison for crimes against the State.

7. March for Peace of July 1.—As part of the need for launching a moral offensive that serves as a basis for a new relationship among the countries of this Hemisphere, President Fidel Castro has expressed his support for the July 1st march to the borders in San Diego and Tijuana for peace and for the establishment of a war free zone in the Hemisphere, from Canada to Cuba.

8. Support for Contadora.—In regard to the situation in Central America, we agreed on the need to seek and support solutions based on respect for non-intervention and non-interference in the internal affairs of nations and respect for their sovereignty and independence.

President Fidel Castro has reiterated Cuba's support for the process of Contadora for attaining a negotiated settlement or solution to the conflict in Central America and to the search for a negotiated solution to the war in El Salvador.

9. Situation in Southern Africa.—Likewise we have discussed the situation in the countries of Southern Afrcia. We agreed on the need to implement UN resolution 435, aimed at the attainment of the real and effective independence of Namibia and the end to aggressions against Angola by South Africa as well as a complete cessation of the South African support for counterrevolutionary groups acting against the government of Angola.

The end to these threats and aggressions would lay the basis for the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola, as was stated in joint communiqués of both governments on February, 1982 and March, 1984.

We held discussions on the need for rendering the support of our moral offensive to other peoples in the African continent, which continue their struggle for peace, independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity, in countries such as Tanzania, Mozambique, Lesotho, Botswana, Zimbabwe, Ethiopia and Congo.

10. Invitation to Fidel Castro.—In closing our discussions tonight, on behalf of a broad base of American citizens, I have extended an invitation to Fidel Castro to visit the United States, to continue this process of rapprochement between our peoples and the moral offensive we have launched today.

REV. JESSE JACKSON'S STATEMENT, MANAGUA, NICARAGUA, JUNE 28, 1984

Let me express my thanks to Mr. Ramirez, Mr. Ortega, Ms. Astorga and all of the other members of the executive committee of the Government of National Reconstruction of Nicaragua for their kind welcome and for their frank discussion regarding their present political, economic and military conditions. It has been a short five years since they successfully overthrew one of the most brutal and despised dictators that the modern world has known, the late and not lamented Gen. Somoza. The fact that Gen. Somoza and his friends sacked the Nicaraguan treasury of no less than 1.6 billion dollars, much of it in the form of American taxpayers' money, and that his misuse of funds created virtually no infrastructural development in the country, and that the present government has had to withstand constant destabilization efforts, and yet has still put Nicaragua back on the road to democracy, peace and reconciliation, speaks well of the commitment not only of these current leaders but also of the will of the Nicaraguan people to build a country that is truly theirs and that can give them the pride and self respect they so richly deserve.

My meeting this morning with the executive committee has resulted in some very important agreements. Just as we have witnessed during our visit to Panama, El Salvador and Cuba, the moral offensive that we have launched has found many friends and supporters. What's more our friends have displayed a passion for peace, a willingness to put old antagonisms aside and work to build safe, prosperous and peaceful hemisphere. Today we have agreed to the following.

1. The Sandinistas have agreed to call for a major summit meeting between themselves and the leadership of the Catholic and Protestant Churches of Nicaragua. These forces are the key indigenous elements to peace in the country. For them to sit at the table and work together to rebuild the nation is essential.

2. The executive committee has agreed to proceed with the scheduled Nov. 4, 1984 elections, in spite of the many difficulties the nation currently faces. What's more, they are committed to the idea that these elections occur after a campaign in which all parties operate under the same conditions. They are hopeful that the current state of emergency will not have to be renewed after its scheduled termination date of July 20, so that the best of conditions for electoral debate may occur.

3. Nicaragua affirms its commitment to a no first strike position regarding its current border conflicts. This is consistent with their commitment to a policy of respect for national sovereignty and territorial integrity. They are committed as well to work out non-aggression agreements with the governments of both Honduras and Costa Rica.

4. They also affirmed their position to dialogue with the United States in order to solve their current differences. They are willing to enter immediately into negotiations with the United States to end the conflict that has impeded their efforts at national reconstruction.

5. Nicaragua affirms its support for the Contadora process. The Sandinistas are agreed that a negotiated settlement is in the best interests of all parties involved.

6. The executive committee also congratulates both the FMLN/FDR and Salvadoran President Duarte for recent contact made through my intervention which respresent the first non-hostile contact between those two forces since the conflict began. Moreover, they expressed their hope that these initial contacts will continue and eventually lead to a peaceful settlement to that long and painful civil war. They made it clear, however, that we must all realize that the Salvadoran conflict and their conflict are very different and distinct and must be analyzed within the appropriate contexts.

7. The leadership also wish to congratulate Cuban President Fidel Castro for the bold and favorable steps that he took over the last two days in our meetings. In particular they expressed their hope that his initiative for dialogue and normalized relations with the United States will be reciprocated by President Reagan. So that these two important actors in hemispheric concerns can begin to relate to each other in a mature and prudent manner.

8. I have also called, and the Sandinistas have agreed, for a major summit meeting among the governments and legitimate political forces of Central America and the Caribbean. This summit meeting should take place as soon as possible so that multilateral dialogue may begin to resolve the problems and concerns of all of these important forces.

9. Finally, the National Government of Reconstruction has agreed to extend the deadline for amnesty to those counterrevolutionaries who have yet to take advantage of it. As of the expiration date of Dec. 1, 1983, some 1400 of these individuals had taken advantage of the amnesty. They have now been reintegrated into Nicaraguan society and some have even received land during the land reform. I am hopeful that those remaining outside of the law will take advantage of this humane extension so that the reconciliation and healing that is so necessary for Nicaragua's reconstruction may proceed.

All of these agreements are most significant in adding impetus to our moral offensive against aggresssion and war. This is the road to peace. The Nicaraguan people wish to get on with the business of rebuilding their society and their nation. Let us put down our arms, forgive past sins, talk to each other and not at each other, and get on with the business of peace and justice. The time is now.●

STATE AND LOCAL NARCOTICS CONTROL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1984

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I join with the distinguished chairman of the House Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL] to introduce legislation designed to ease the burdens that drug abuse and trafficking have placed on communities across the Nation. As the ranking minority member of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, I am pleased that this legislation has been endorsed by the Select Committee, since the bill will go a long way in providing some Federal relief—and leadership—to States and local governments in their fight against narcotics.

During our field hearings last year, the Select Committee heard testimony from local and State representatives who indicated that their communities were unable to meet the demands created by an influx of narcotics, and a rise in narcotics abuse. When the Select Committee held its hearing in New York City in June 1983, we heard that treatment, law enforcement, and court costs were sapping the sources of New York and other suburban areas surrounding New York. With 1,500 people waiting for treatment, with two-thirds of New York's prison inmates using narcotics, and with a paucity of funds for drug enforcement in New York City, the prognosis for progress was grim.

In Redding, CA, the Select Committee heard testimony from a local county supervisor who told the committee that the cost of prosecution for drug traffickers and marijuana cultivators was prohibitive. With the influx of narcotics criminals crossing other State borders to come to California, that State was unable to handle the costs and responsibilities for prosecution and incarceration alone.

While in south Florida, in October 1983, the Select Committee again heard that local communities were simply unable to meet the costs of enforcement, prosecution, treatment, and education. South Florida continues to be victimized by the increasing tide of cocaine coming in from South America, and the citizens of that region have looked to the Federal Government for assistance.

And in the gulf region of Texas, the Corpus Christi area, the Select Committee discovered that local communities could not afford to provide treatment to thousands of abusers seeking help. Education and prevention were virtually nonexistent, and the increasing flow of Mexican heroin over the Mexican border was threatening the stability and health of Texas communities.

The legislation we have introduced today makes grants to the States for the purpose of increasing the level of State and local enforcment of State laws relating to production, illegal possession, and transfer of controlled substances. The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to make grants to the States for the purpose of increasing the ability of States to provide drug abuse prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation programs.

By authorizing a $750 million grant program, the Federal Government is taking a much needed leadership role—a role which has been requested by the States and local governments. With $750 million available to the States in fiscal years 1986 through 1990, we hope to finally stem the tide of this deadly epidemic which has created so much misery and which has exacted such a large toll from the American people.

Provisions of the legislation include:

The Federal Government will provide additional personnel, equipment, facilities, personnel training, and supplies for States to apprehend traffickers;

Assistance will be provided to the States to help them eradicate illicit crops—such as marijuana;

Assistance to the States for additional correctional facilities for the detention of persons convicted of trafficking, production, possession, and transfer of controlled substances will be made; and

Additional personnel, equipment, personnel training, and supplies necessary for more widespread adjudication of cases involving persons accused of violating State narcotics laws will be provided.

In addition to these enforcement aspects of the legislation, the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to administer a grant program to the States to increase the availability of rehabilitation, education, and prevention programs. With the provision of $125 million over a 5-year period, States and local governments will be more willing and able to provide the type of educational, prevention, and treatment services necessary to meet the demands for these vital services.

This legislation is a perfect illustration of how the Federal Government can help the States and local governments find their way out of the tragic emergency which has taken so many lives, and which has cost these governments so much. I thank the gentleman, my colleague from New York, Mr. RANGEL, for the leadership that he has demonstrated in introducing this legislation, and I urge my colleagues to act quickly on this bill which can make the difference between life and death in our Nation's local communities.●

FLORIO INTRODUCES BASIC SKILLS BILL

HON. JOSEPH G. MINISH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, on May 30, my colleague from New Jersey, Representative JAMES J. FLORIO, jointly introduced with Representative PAT WILLIAMS from Montana, the Secondary Schools Basic Skills Act. I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of this measure. The purpose of this bill is to aid local secondary schools with high concentrations of low-income students by providing them with $900 million annually to upgrade their basic skills instruction.

As you know, the "Nation At Risk" report and other education studies have shown that proficiency in the basic skills has faltered over the past 20 years. Our Nation's high schools are experiencing increased dropout rates, and more and more school students are unable to pass required basic skills tests necessary for graduation. By providing secondary schools, with economically disadvantaged students, supplemental funding to fine-tune basic skills such as reading, writing, math, and command of the English language, the Congress would be helping promote equity in our Nation's classrooms. We would be offering those who enter high school with a distinct economic disadvantage an opportunity to learn and compete with those students who are financially better off.

Our schools are our most precious resource. As an original cosponsor of this important education bill, I believe the Secondary Schools Basic Skills Act will help preserve and replenish this resource for both today's and tomorrow's student. I, therefore, urge my fellow colleagues to join me in supporting this basic skills legislation, and submit the following newspaper article for their review.

[From the Paterson News, June 14, 1984]

SKILLS AT RISK

'CRISIS' PROMPTS EFFORT TO HELP NEEDY SCHOOLS

(By David R. Palombi)

WASHINGTON.—Hearings have begun into legislation introduced by two New Jersey congressmen that would provide $900 million annually to help needy schools upgrade basic skills programs.

The bill, sponsored in the Senate By Democrat Bill Bradley of Denville and in the House by Rep. James Florio, D-Camden, would target funds to school systems such as Trenton, Paterson, and Union City with large numbers of economically disadvantaged students.

The money would be used to help students in grades seven through 12. After the first two years of the program, continued funding for a school would be contingent upon improvement either in the number of students passing a state-approved basic-skills test or through a reduction in its dropout rate.

"Our nation's high schools are in the midst of an economic and academic crisis," Florio told the House Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary, and Vocational Education.

Upgrading skills such as reading, writing, math, and command of the English language are needed urgently "to instill in our children the knowledge and know-how they will need to survivie in the workplace of tomorrow," he said.

Florio noted that less than a third of the students taking the College Basic Skills Test last year in New Jersey were proficient in verbal skills and basic math. Less than 12 percent were proficient in elementary algebra.

Bradley presented the subcommittee with statistics showing that 23 million American adults and about 13 percent of all 17-year-olds have inadequate basic skills for every day functioning.

He said functional illiteracy among urban youth may run as high as 40 percent.

"A fair proportion of our youth have trouble reading a newspaper, a recipe, instructions on a package of prepared food, or filling out a job application," Bradley told the subcommittee.

He also warned that while many states, including New Jersey, have increased academic course requirements for graduation, more is needed. If students are not also given sufficient support, he said, stiffer regulations may only encourage dropping out among those who feel their prospects for meeting such standards are remote.

Also testifying yesterday was Gregory Anrig, president of Educational Testing Service in Princeton. He told the subcommittee that test and other data show a "disturbing decline" in recent years in the progress of high-school students in math and reading. He said the decline is particularly pronounced among those who are economically disadvantaged.

This decline is in contrast to improvements among economically disadvantaged elementary-school pupils, who have been the primary targets of compensatory education programs, Anrig said.

He added that current data "supports the need for action at the high-school level" and said that if the nation is to tighten educational standards, it also must help students meet those standards.

20TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, July 2 will mark the 20th anniversary of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, one of the most important pieces of legislation ever passed by the Congress. The passage of this act has deeply affected the lives of all Americans. It fulfilled the promise of the Constitution for millions of disadvantaged citizens. It guaranteed the right to vote to all black Americans, it desegregated public facilities and schools, and created equal employment opportunities for all people.

In recognition of this anniversary, Mr. Speaker, we ought to recall the events that led up to the bill's enactment, and the sacrifices of those in the civil rights movement.

Prior to 1963 the Supreme Court decision in Brown against Board of Education, the Montgomery bus boycott, and the 1960 sit-ins beginning in Greensboro, NC, gradually convinced the country of the need to initiate some type of civil rights legislation. At first there was just a small group leading this movement, but by 1963 people of all races, creeds, and colors were showing their support.

Birmingham, AL, was the site of massive demonstrations by thousands of black Americans demanding desegregation, improvement of job opportunities, establishment of a biracial committee and dismissal of charges against at least 2,000 demonstrators previously arrested.

The demonstrators used the nonviolent techniques of Dr. Martin Luther King, which were returned with violence. Progress was stalled—but not halted—by a number of tragedies occurring in the climate of this growing tension. Three civil rights workers in Philadelphia, MS, were murdered, churches were burned, and threats against many were made.

These dramatic events created a groundswell for Federal action and soon thereafter President Kennedy sent to Congress civil rights legislation dealing with voting, education, and the Civil Rights Commission. The leadership conference group was formed to help implement the President's request to gain public support for his bill, and on August 28, 1963, 200,000 people representing diverse backgrounds gathered in Washington for the largest demonstration ever held here. The March on Washington was timely in promoting the act and it was here that Dr. Martin Luther King delivered his famous speech, "I Have a Dream". President Kennedy commended the leaders for their efforts and dedication. Millions of Americans were stirred by King's dramatic words.

After President Kennedy's death in November 1963, President Johnson quicky began discussing effective strategies for getting the legislation through Congress. An elaborate whip system was developed in the House to keep track of members whereabouts during the debates and also of how they were voting. On the Senate side the legislative conference working under Senators Hubert Humphrey and Everett Dirksen, used extensive lobbying efforts and a bipartisian newsletter was printed daily to keep supporters informed on all activities.

On June 19, 1964, the Senate passed H.R. 7152. On July 2, 1964, the House adopted House Resolution 789, and on the very same day President Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

In his speech on August 28, 1963, at the Lincoln Memorial, Dr. Martin Luther King said:

This is no time to engage in the luxury of cooling off or to take the tranquilizing drug of gradualism. Now is the time to make real the promises of democracy. Now is the time to lift our nation from the quicksands of racial injustice to the solid rock of brotherhood. Now is the time to make justice a reality for all of God's children.

The Congress heeded the words of Dr. King, and 1 year later passed the Civil Rights Act. As a nation we benefitted enormously, Mr. Speaker, and it is important to recognize this extraordinary anniversary.

Americans still are moved by the memories of those tumultuous days. But, the struggle is not finished. In the late 1960's, Dr. King said that we have come a long way but still have a long way to go.

And the words of Abraham Lincoln ring as true today as they did in 1865:

Let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the Nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.●

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT SYSTEM

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, The Civil Service Retirement System has been the subject of extensive debate during this Congress, and we will be working on reform of the retirement system next year. Prof. Michael S. March, of the University of Colorado at Denver, prepared the following article on the retirement system. I believe it should be of interest to my colleagues.

SAVE CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT RIGHTS

(By Michael S. March, Ph.D.)

Today I deal with pocketbook issues which deeply affect the welfare of civilian federal retirees. The most important essential for elderly Americans is adequate, assured income. More than 95 of every 100 elderly lack the savings necessary for retirement.

For this reason the great majority of retired people in the U.S. depend for their survival on federal pensions such as Social Security and Civil Service Retirement (CSR). Civil Service employees in the federal government are perpetually underpaid—by more than 20 percent of comparable private wages at the present time. The great majority of retirees are likely to be heavily or even totally dependent on their CSR annuities. The Grace Commission has estimated that 70 percent or more of CSR retirees "eventually" are covered by Social Security. However, for most of them such coverage would be partial, because until January, 1984, federal employees under CSR were not covered by Social Security—unlike Military Personnel who had dual coverage.

THE UNFAIR ASSAULT ON CSR

Civilian federal retirees have borne more than their proper share of attack and abuse in recent years. Our two last presidents have run against the bureaucracy.

Since 1975 the Congress has followed these two presidents in repeatedly cutting CSR benefits, particularly the cost-of-living adjustments (COLAS) for retirees a half a dozen times or more. NARFE headquarters report that CSR retirees have already lost $5.3 billion, of which $2.5 billon has been since January, 1981. The President's 1985 budget proposes further CSR cutbacks for both retirees and active employees, which would rise to an annual rate of $1 billlion by fiscal year 1987.

As retirees we have experienced many unfortunate attacks on us in the last year or two, as follows:

The inadequately-considered recommendation by President Reagan's National Commission on Social Security to put new Civil Service hires under Social Security. This was enacted blindly by the Congress in 1983 even though no plan existed for the supplementary retirement system. This action leaves the "new hires" after January 1, 1984, dangling and it threatens both the active employees and the retirees with being left in a dying CSR system.

Nationwide propaganda by Wall Street financier Peter G. Peterson's so-called Bi-Partisan Budget Appeal (supported by 500 businessmen) called for cuts of $60 billion a year in so-called "entitlement" programs which were not "needs tested"—chiefly those for CSR and Social Security retirees. The Reader's Digest for March, 1983, carried his attack on Social Security into millions of homes with his fatuously misleading allegation that the program "threatens our entire economy." He is oblivious to the tax subsidies for corporate pensions from which businessmen benefit on pensions up to $90,000 a year or more.

The Grace Commission (technically the "President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control") report on Personnel Management in 1983 maligned the CSR system with a whole series of inaccurate, unsupported comparisons. It alleged that three-year savings of $30 billion were possible. General Accounting Office (GAO) and Congressional Budget Office (CBO) analysts found the savings figures grossly overstated and many of the recommendations questionable.

PENDING LEGISLATIVE ACTIONS AFFECTING CSR

The negative public climate toward CSR which has been created by high politicians in the last two administrations coupled with the powerful business and allied media attacks on Federal Social Security and other retirement systems as part of the Reaganomic program are bearing bitter legislative fruits for federal employees and retirees.

The most far-advanced action is the so-called seven-month deferral of COLAS to January, 1985, for retirees which has now been passed by the House and by the Senate Budget Committee as part of the Reconciliation process on the fiscal 1984 budget. Unfortunately for retirees, the one-year base for the next COLA will be computed from the third quarter of 1983 to the third quarter of 1984. The increase for six months of something like 3 percent which was due effective May, 1983, will be permanently lost, along with subsequent COLAS on that increment. This is not a deferral, it is a take-away!

The second big set of actions pertains to the development of the supplementary retirement plan for new hires to go along with their Social Security coverage. At least three sets of studies are underway. The House Post Office and Civil Service Committee has engaged the help of Hay/Higgins, Inc. and the GAO in its work. The Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs is involved, how deeply is not yet clear. Finally, the Office of Personnel Management has let a contract for a substantial study.

WHY THE PRESSURE ON CSR?

Several factors combine to bring pressure on the CSR system. High inflation in the 1970s has inflated the figures in the federal budget and for CSR so they look much bigger than they are in real terms. By 1983 consumer prices were 3.3 times the 1962 level—so 70 percent of CSR benefits in 1983 were inflation puffery. Meantime, federal salary increases lagged far behind inflation—making COLA-adjusted annuities look high in relation to wages. A third problem was that in 1969 CSR trust fund expenditures were included in the "unified budget"—so the President and the Congress inappropriately began to look at them not as contractual commitments to pay funds held in trust, but as "cutback" targets in any given year.

Reaganomics is, however, the prime cause of the CSR system's problems. The Reagan administration wants to reduce the government and cut its employees and their compensation. The Conservative strategy has been to cut taxes in order to force cuts in expenditures—and it is working. In 1981 President Reagan got Congress to cut taxes by $750 billion over five years—and half of that tax cut was for the 17 percent of taxpayers with incomes of over $40,000. The poor and the low income people got little or no tax reductions, but they suffered substantial cuts in budget programs which aided them.

The Reaganomic strategy of putting a tax lid on the budget has put pressure on all social programs. The projected five-year federal budget deficits from 1984 to 1989 are officially estimated at $873 billion. Net Reagan tax cuts account for over $600 billion of this red ink. The five-year increases in defense outlays over the 1980 level by themselves can account for the entire deficit, while the five-year increases in interest on the public debt over the 1980 level exceed $350 billion. The budget deficits have clearly been caused by President Reagan's policies.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT RIGHTS

If retirees are to be able to protect their CSR pensions we must understand the basis for our rights so we can defend them effectively:

1. CSR is a staff retirement system. Its purpose is to provide an incentive for able civil servants to devote their careers to the government. The retirement payments thus are deferred compensation for services faithfully rendered.

2. CSR pensions are computed in proportion to length of service and degree of attained responsibility, the latter measured by the high-three-year average pay rate—once required age has been reached. CSR annuities are thus earned rights. Moreover, as earned deferred compensation they have historically been paid without any test of need. Earned CSR rights are superior to welfare claims.

3. Employees contribute heavily to CSR. Historically they paid much more than Social Security workers and very much more than workers in private plans. Moreover, CSR contributions are paid out of taxable income, draw no interest for the employee in the trust fund, and pensions are taxable as soon as payouts exceed the employee's own contributions.

4. CSR pensions are funded by means of a trust fund, which was created to assure payment of earned pension obligations. Under statutory provisions enacted in 1969, establishing appropriate actuarial funding to stabilize the unfunded accrued liability, the CSR trust fund, even by OPM's statements, is good for 75 years—and, indeed, probably indefinitely. CSR is financially solid!

5. By original legislative intent, and morally, earned CSR annuities are a contractual obligation between the government as employer and its employees and retirees.

It can be concluded safely that the practice of the Reagan administration of recommending (and the Congress enacting) changes in substantive laws for already retired CSR workers to renege on benefits which the law provided when they retired is a violation of the integrity of the U.S. Government—and is, in all likelihoods, a violation of a legal contract. The same may also be true of such ex post facto legislative changes to reduce or take away vested CSR benefit rights. Such awarded or vested CSR pension rights should be treated by the Government as binding obligations—in the same category as interest on public debt obligations.

THE RIGHT TO PROTECTION FROM INFLATION

Since 1962 CSR annuitants have had two important rights: First, to receive their earned pensions. Second, to have the real purchasing power of the pension maintained by means of periodic cost-of-living adjustments.

There are several reasons why the COLA is warranted: (1) This society causes inflation and thus the Government has a responsibility to protect people dependent on fixed incomes payable by it. (2) The typical CSR retiree's pension is less than 50 percent of his or her final pay. Retirees have already taken a cut in their standard of living and have little slack for further reductions. (3) Since 1962 COLAS have been provided by the Retirement Act and hence are part of the employment/pension contract on which government employees and retirees have come to rely. The COLA provision is statutory and is no different from other statutory pension provisions. (4) Most important of all, in the absence of COLAS the high rates of inflation which have prevailed in the U.S. since the middle 1960s would quickly devalue the real worth of an annuity.

CSR annuitants have a right to demand better treatment than progressive impoverishment from the Government to which they devoted the best years of their working lives.●

COOPERATIVE EDUCATION PROGRAMS

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring the following article, which describes the value of cooperative education programs, to the attention of my colleagues. Under these programs, postsecondary students alternate periods of academic study with periods of employment. Thus, students gain access to education by being able to work their way through college. At the same time, they gain significant work experience, and graduate from college well prepared to enter the work force full time.

In addition to being valuable for both students and industry, cooperative education actually relieves some Federal financial burden. Because the students involved become relatively self-sufficient—they use their earnings to finance most of their college expenses—they can reduce the demand for Federal student aid. Further, these programs more than pay for themselves. Cooperative education students can earn approximately $1 billion each year, about 10 percent of which is returned to the Federal Treasury in the form of taxes and social security contributions. That approximately $100 million in revenue far exceeds the current $14.4 million Federal outlay for the programs. Without Federal moneys, most cooperative education programs would cease to exist. Yet, for the past 2 years the administration has proposed elimination of funding for the programs.

Cooperative education, which reinforces this country's work ethic, is clearly good for education, good for business, and fiscally responsible. It undoubtedly merits the support of this body.

FINANCING COLLEGE: A WAY TO PAY THAT'S NOT JUST ACADEMIC

(By Steven H. Madoff)

By studying one semester and working the next, students can help with tuition bills and get their careers launched early.

Back when annual college bills ran to three figures, a few schools started something called cooperative education—alternating semesters of off-campus jobs with semesters of study. For decades it was looked on as an eccentric way to spend your undergraduate years. Now, with the average annual cost of tuition, room and board running close to $9,000 at private colleges, co-op education has been discovered for what it is—part cost cutter, part career builder.

From 1970 to 1938, the number of colleges and universities offering such programs grew from 200 to about 1,000; last year alone, 200,000 students enrolled in them earned $1.5 billion. And the federal government, despite its sharp cuts in financial aid for higher education in general, is considering increasing co-op funding from $14.4 million to as much as $20 million next year.

Co-op education has nothing to do with conventional work-study programs, under which colleges provide part-time on-campus jobs for undergraduates. In a typical co-op arrangement, a student takes a responsible job, often as a trainee in his chosen field, at a company that has formally agreed to cooperate with a school in providing off-campus employment. On average, co-op students earn $6,000 for a half a year's work. These earnings, minus income taxes, are usually figured into the student's financial aid package back at college, thus decreasing his need for grants and loans.

Co-oping is a powerful help to the graduate job seeker too. It often leads to full-time employment with the same company and at a higher salary than a less experienced applicant could expect. The federal government, the largest co-op employer of all, put about 13,000 students to work in 1983—chiefly in the military services, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Treasury and the Department of Agriculture. And the U.S. holds on to 75% of these students after graduation.

In fact, the experience often turns out to be of far more lasting value than the money. Notes Sam Sovilla, director of the University of Cincinnati's co-op program: "Once students get into their co-op jobs, the financial benefits have become a given. Then the students start focusing on career development."

Preparation for entering a co-op program doesn't begin until at least freshman year. During the first term, the student can talk to the school's co-op counselors, look through job lists and decide on which jobs to apply for. He also states what subject he plans to major in, but he can change his mind later. While it's possible to begin off-campus work during the spring term of freshman year, generally a student waits until he has experienced a full year of campus life. To be accepted and to continue in many co-op programs, a student must maintain a grade-point average of at least 2.5 on a 4.0 scale.

The next steps are job applications and interviews. For govenment work, you fill out Standard Form 171—the Personal Qualifications Statement—which asks for a listing of work experience and courses completed. After being accepted for a job, a student typically begins alternating work and academic terms, including summers, until his senior year, when many co-op programs require that he return to school full time.

Though students may receive some academic credit for their work, they complete most of their degree requirements in the classroom. Co-op students usually make up for lost academic time in summer school. Some take five years to get their baccalaureates, but they almost always pay only minimum enrollment fees, sometimes nothing, for semesters when they're off working.

A free bronchure that answers virtually any question you might have on the subject is Undergraduate Programs of Cooperative Education in the United States and Canada (National Commission for Cooperative Education, 360 Huntington Ave., Boston, Mass. 02115). It lists participating schools, length of work terms, type of credit given and the most popular kinds of jobs. Another helpful guide is Earn and Learn: Cooperative Education Opportunities Offered by the Federal Government (Octameron Press, P.O. Box 3437, Alexandria, Va. 22302; $2.25 including postage).

Co-oping isn't everyone's ideal college education. Most co-op students are in business administration, computer science, engineering and the hard sciences. Humanities students are in less demand for co-op jobs, and those who participate in cooperative programs don't fare as well as more technical graduates. The median starting salary for 1983 co-op grads in mechanical engineering was $26,000; for graduates with B.A.s in the humanities, it was exactly half that.

Lance Goodmon, 20, a junior majoring in areospace mechanical engineering at the University of Central Florida in Orlando, is among the lucky ones. "I've always liked tinkering, figuring out mechanical devices," he says. "I wanted the same kind of experience in school, directly applying what I learned." In his senior year of high school, Goodmon heard of the co-op program that the university maintained with NASA. "I knew that's what I wanted to do," he recalls.

Goodmon had a foretaste of job competition when he first applied to the NASA program: there were no positions available. He reapplied and beat out 14 other applicants for a six-month stint on a crew helping systems engineers to build equipment for Spacelab at the Kennedy Space Center.

Since then Goodmon has been able to get through school mostly on his own. Like many co-op students who seek jobs near their home towns, Goodmon lives with his parents—15 miles from the space center and 30 miles from campus. So he could scratch room and board costs. He calculated his expenses last year at $4,700, including tuition, books entertainment and the 1981 Datsun 200SX that he's paying off over 36 months. During work terms, he pays $25 for registration. His earnings were $7,200, leaving him savings of $2,500.

Peter Watson, 24, a junior in physics at Antioch College in Yellow Springs, Ohio, has helped to test the currents where the Indian and Atlantic oceans meet. It happened on an oceanographic cruise off South last fall.

Co-oping actually drew Watson back to higher education. After an unhappy first year at Rensselaer Polytechnic in Troy, N.Y., he dropped out for four years and worked as a forklift operator in Birmingham, Ala., his home town. Then he heard about Anticoh's co-op program and was attracted by its practical, untheoretical approach. Through a Guaranteed Student Loan, two college grants, part-time work as a teaching assistant and his co-op earnings, he's been able to pay the $9,290 annual total cost of tuition, room and board, save a bit and, as he says, "live humbly."

Antioch and other centers of cooperative education—notably Drexel University in Philadelphia, Georgia Tech in Atlanta, Northeastern University in Boston and the University of Cincinnati—are best known for offering varied job possibilities. It's a major benefit of their long-established relations with business and the scientific community.

Yet you don't always have to go to those schools to find a broad variety of job opportunities. Robert Kahn, 21, a junior in economics and international relations at Macalester College in St. Paul, has found work related to his major that has given him a taste of Europe as well as helped to pay his college bills. Unlike typical co-op programs, Macalester's doesn't operate on alternating terms. Students work in the summer, again during a six-week winter break and up to 20 hours a week while studying on campus.

Medtronic Inc., a medical-equipment manufacturer in Minneapolis, hired Kahn for an internship in international finance. He was kept on as a senior financial clerk and set up a computer data base for foreign-currency fluctuations. At a salary of $285 a week, he earned $4,500, saved half and put the other half toward Macalester's $9,350 annual costs. He paid the rest with scholarships, a residence assistantship in his dorm and $4,500 from his parents.

During his winter break, Kahn finished up his project in Medtronic's Paris office and then began studying economics for a term at the Center for Euorpean Studies in Toulon. In June he'll rejoin Medtronic for the summer, traveling among its offices in France, Belgium and Spain. Says Kahn: "Now I want to apply to graduate business schools and specialize in international finance."

Cyndi Carr, 20, decided on her career objective halfway through high school. She wants to go into food-processing management. A junior in the Food Science and Technology Department at Oregon State University in Corvallis, she is enrolled in what fellow students call a six-pack program: six months at school and six months at work. Carr started co-oping last fall at General Foods' Birdseye division in Woodburn, about an hour's drive from campus. A quality-control supervisor for frozen foods, she directed a staff of up to 20 workers. She earned $7,200 during her first term at Birdseye and was easily able to cover her $3,600 living expenses. She explains: "I didn't want to go to college and find out after four years that I didn't like what I was doing.

Mitzi Canavit, 20, gets a chance to see things from a decidedly uncampuslike perspective. Sitting in the cockpit of an F-15 fighter, she reads the position of a distant jet on her instrument panel, accelerates, pulls up next to it, then drops down, does a loop and signs off.

Her F-15 cockpit is actually MACS-5, the Manned Air Combat Simulator at McDonnell Douglas' St. Louis headquarters. There Canavit, a junior electrical engineering major at the University of Missouri, is in her third work team, helping to develop software programs for several types of flight simulators. Besides earning $7,500, she is eligible for many of the benefits of a full-time employee—a common practice in co-oping. Her salary enables her to chip in $925 a semester for room and board at school—her parents contribute the $800-a-semester tuition—and still have some spending money.

Says she: "Working in the intense atmosphere at McDonnell Douglas has been a real confidence builder. I know it's going to pay off when I graduate." Right now, Canavit, like so many other co-op students, feels like she's flying.●

MR. FARRAKHAN'S REMARKS

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I have devoted a major part of my life to the cause of civil and human rights. In that struggle I have found that many other Americans of good will have engaged in the same cause.

During the civil rights movement of the sixties many people came together across ethnic, racial, and religious lines in order to work toward the eradication of every last vestige of racial discrimination in America. The beauty of the civil rights movement was that black Americans were not alone in their struggle to achieve justice and equality under our constitutional form of Government.

In the coalitions that came together one of the more prominent coalitions was that of blacks and Jews who came together, worked together, sat-in together, marched together, worshipped together, and even died together. It was during this period of time that the relationship between blacks and Jews reached its greatest height. I am particularly proud of the friendships which I developed during that era which endures today, more than 20 years later.

However, since the sixties we have not seen this coalition remain together as a cohesive unit. Over the years there have been occasions where differences of opinion on issues relating to blacks and Jews have created tensions between both groups. Many of us who were involved in the coalition of the sixties have tried over the years to bridge these legitimate differences with continuous dialog. The rationale behind continuous dialog is that we can disagree without being disagreeable. Recently, the relationship between the black and Jewish community has received a great deal of attention through the media as a result of statements made by different persons during the current Presidential campaign. This has been unfortunate because what I think it has done has been to permit the exploitation of legitimate disagreement and differences between the two groups.

This week it has been reported that Minister Louis Farrakhan of the Nation of Islam has made certain scurrilous statements about Israel and Judaism. These statements as reported are abhorrent and should be both resented and rejected by all persons of good will.

As a black American I am committed to building and living in a society free of racial and religious intolerance. I live by the principle that racial and religious hatred, bigotry, prejudice, and racism in this society are to be condemned and scorned no matter who the purveyor or purveyors may be.

My commitment to this principle demands that I condemn racism, bigotry, and intolerance in any form, from any individual, regardless of his race, religion, or ethnic background.●

TRIBUTE TO FLOYD BOLDRIDGE

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, in my hometown of Lexington, Floyd Boldridge is an institution. His friendship and community leadership have long been contributions to our town. The following is an article written about Mr. Boldridge, and I want to share it with this body, as it reflects a life of service and goodwill.

Most people around the age of 60 start to think about retiring from their line of work and begin to contemplate on how they will spend their free time. But for Floyd Boldridge, this just isn't the case. Floyd decided to pass up retirement years ago and continues to labor, scissors in hand, as owner and employee of the GEM barbershop located at 111 South 11 St. At 86 years young, Floyd offers one of the best business propositions in town, a quality haircut at a low price, and good conversation.

For Floyd, becoming a barber was only natural. His grandfather, Matt Boldridge, started the family business with his two sons, Louie and Tom in 1910. The shop was opened on 10th street (Now the law firm of Bradley-Langdon-Bradley) and remained there for 70 years. In 1918, Floyd cut his first head of hair for an expensive 35 cents. Inflation has since hit Floyd's business and he has been forced to raise his price. He now charges $3.50 for a haircut and $2.50 for a shave.

For six years now Floyd has worked alone. In 1976 Floyd's brother, Manville, retired from the three-generation-old business, the last of the five Boldridge brothers to work in the barbershop besides Floyd. Throughout the years, Floyd and his brothers cut the hair of many famous people, among them Ike Skelton, General Houge, and players from the old Kansas City Blues baseball team.

Competition has never bothered Floyd because he feels that his haircuts and shaves are of the highest quality. He never was much for the changing hair styles either. As for women, he said he used to cut their hair, but eventually they started coming in and asking for all the latest cuts, something that he just wasn't much interested in or had the time for. Nowadays, things are starting to slow down but Floyd still manages to keep busy. "I'm busy a couple days during the week, but most of the time I just relax in the shop and enjoy talking with the people who stop by," says Boldridge, "Most of my customers are older men who have been regulars for years, so I don't really worry about stirring up new business," added Boldridge.

When entering his shop, one can't help but to be intrigued by the old-fashioned equipment he still uses. From his 60-year-old brass Koken-Congress model barber chair to his steel combs, Floyd insists on using the old tools of the trade which he feels more comfortable with. But the most interesting piece in his shop may be the first thing you notice when entering. A painting, taken from a 1919 photograph, looms largely over the lounge area of the shop. The painting is an oil, done by Austin Booth of Marshall. The painting depicts the original barbershop as it stood in the early 1900's.

Floyd plans to continue cutting hair and solving the world's political problems with his customers for a few more years. Physically, he feels like he is capable. "Nothing hurts me and I am blessed with almost perfect health. My daily routine seems to keep me in shape," said Boldridge. Sports also seem to keep Floyd young. Although he hasn't actively participated for some 60 years, he still enjoys a good ball game along with some good fishing and a little gardening in his spare time.●

LEGISLATION TO EXAMINE THE LINK BETWEEN ACID RAIN AND THE DECLINE IN STRIPED BASS

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, as many of my colleagues know, the Atlantic coast striped bass has suffered a great deal in the last decade because of the effects of pollution.

A report released earlier this year by two University of Maryland scientists showed that the decline in the commercial and recreational fishery since 1974 has cost the region 7,500 jobs and $220 million in economic revenues.

While much has been lost in this fishery, it continues to have amazing strength. In 1980, the current commercial and recreational fishery was supporting 5,600 jobs, causing $90 million in annual spending and creating $200 million in related economic activity in the coastal areas of the States.

I am particularly concerned about the Atlantic coast striped bass since up to 90 percent of them spawn in the Chesapeake Bay, an estuary which literally surrounds my congressional district. The decline of the bay as a suitable habitat for marine and aquatic habitat is a major factor in the reduced abundance of the striper.

As a result, the passage of H.R. 3282, the Water Quality Renewal Act of 1984, is a landmark step to save the striped bass. This measure contains a bill that I introduced earlier in the 98th Congress, which Public Works Chairman HOWARD and Water Resources Subcommittee Chairman ROE included, to begin a Federal program to clean up the bay. Final enactment of this initiative later this year, when combined with a $10 million downpayment on the bay program in the fiscal year 1985 HUD-Independent Agencies appropriations, will go a long way to bringing back the striped bass.

Some of my House colleagues believe that the way to replenish this species is by imposing a coastwide Federal moratorium. I think that this kind of Federal preemption in fisheries management, for what has traditionally been a State responsibility, is ill advised.

Scientists agree that a combination of factors have caused the decline in the striped bass, but cannot pinpoint that stopping all fishing of this species will restore it.

In addition, almost all the Atlantic coast States have implemented the proposed plan by the Atlantic States Marine Fisheries Commission to reduce the fishing of striped bass by 55 percent. My own State of Maryland has made great sacrifices to begin moving toward complying with the ASMFC recommendations. The additional penalty of a moratorium would cost Maryland $50 million annually.

Given the uncertainties which this action would have upon restoring the fishery, the work of the States to control striped bass fishing and the further severe economic consequences it poses to commercial fishermen and the seafood industry in general, I am firmly opposed to Federal action at this time.

One of the gaps in our information about the striped bass is the effect which acid rain has had on its decline. Several recent articles and reports have linked the loss in the number of striped bass to low pH levels in the Chesapeake Bay, particularly during the time of the year when the species spawn. Unfortunately, one of the serious gaps in our information about the striped bass' decline is whether there is any officially conclusive proof that links acid rain to the striper.

That is why I am introducing legislation today which authorizes an interdepartmental study to examine this issue. It is my hope that the knowledge it will generate can help us to take the appropriate actions in Congress that will actually help to restore the striped bass.●

SAN JUAN BASIN WILDERNESS

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month, the House unanimously passed a bill I introduced to designate roughly 30,000 acres in the San Juan Basin of New Mexico as wilderness. H.R. 3766 will designate two wilderness study areas—De-na-zin and Bisti—as wilderness while assuring that the wilderness study process continues in an area know as Ah-shi-sle-pah.

The Ah-shi-sle-pah area is a little over 7,000 acres and is located in the 3.5-million-acre San Juan County. According to the Bureau of Land Management, this small WSA contains less than nine-tenths of 1 percent of the Federal recoverable coal in the San Juan Basin. However, mining companies believe the coal is extremely valuable and would be easily recovered through surface mining methods. In addition, the area is overlapped with preference right lease applications.

Although my original proposal would have designated the Ah-shi-sle-pah area as wilderness, in order to move my legislation forward, I agreed to simply reaffirm the ongoing study process at this time. I still believe this area is worthy of wilderness protection. Its unique geological formations and petrified remains are among the most beautiful in the Southwest and I am hopeful the study process will lead to the eventual designation of Ah-shi-sle-pah as wilderness.

I commend to my colleagues the following article which appeared in the February 5, 1984, edition of the Denver Post Empire magazine. I believe this article clearly articulates the San Juan Basin wilderness issue. With Ah-shi-sle-pah controversy set aside for now, I am confident that H.R. 3766 will soon be enacted into law.

A DELICATE BALANCE: COAL MINING THREATENS THE NATURAL MUSEUM THAT IS THE SAN JUAN BASIN

(By Sherry Zimmer Robinson)

New Mexico Highway 57 bisects the San Juan Basin, a desolate area the size of Maryland in northwestern New Mexico and the extreme southwestern corner of Colorado. Navajo truck paths feather out from the highway to distant hogans, the eight-sided dwellings that seems to grow out of the land and face the east so the occupants can greet the sunrise each day. The terrain rolls and swells into broad cuestas, rising and then dropping abruptly into sandstone cliffs. Sagebrush, some grassland, and stubborn piñon hugging gaunt mesa offer the only greenery.

As the road winds north, a traveler can glimpse shale and sandstone spires, pinnacles and toadstools shaped and reshaped by erosion until they resemble the scenery of a science fiction movie. In these pink, orange, and ghostly white badlands the Navajos call the Bisti (BIST-eyes), De-na-zin and Ah-she-sli-pah, not even sagebrush can get a foothold. It seems that nothing grows easily here, except controversy.

Indians and desert rats aren't the only ones interested in the San Juan Basin. Paleontologists have discovered a world-class assortment of fossils from an era that could hold the key to the disappearance of the dinosaur, archeologists have identified thousands of sites remaining from one of North America's most advanced prehistoric civilizations; the Sierra Club declared the Basin's delicate sandstone formations a priority as early as 1971.

But it is another holdover from an ancient era that has thrust the Basin into dispute. Two hundred billion tons of coal—an estimated seven million to ten millions tons of which can be strip mined—lie among the fossils, artifacts, and otherworldly beauty of the San Juan Basin. As nature would have it, the richest coal areas are also the richest fossil preserves. A working coal mine already abuts the breathtaking Bisti area, and many fear that excessive mining will ruin the Basin, both as a homeland for the Navajos and a treasure trove of antiquities.

After some initial polarization, however, there has been unprecedented cooperation toward protecting the area while allowing mines to operate. The coal industry repeatedly has given assurances that the Basin's antiquities and Navajo property wouldn't be scooped up in a frenzied drive to extract coal. A few companies demonstrated their intentions by contracting for research above and beyond what was required by environmental laws. One archaeologist fears that researchers won't be able to keep up with the volume of new information directly attributable to development.

Some novel, if uneasy, compromises were in the works when former Secretary of the Interior James Watt announced a proposal to least eight times as much San Juan real estate in one sweep as his predecessors had done under the two previous administrations. New Mexico officials, struggling to balance the deficit-racked budget of a state forty-second in per capita income, were anxious to proceed with coal development. But not that anxious. State officials thumped Watt and the federal Bureau of Land Management for inadequate preparation and termed the proposal a "fire sale." Subsequent negotiations reduced the acreage and delayed the leasing.

It can't exactly be said that industry, the Bureau of Land Management, the state, environmentalists, academics, and the Navajos are strange bedfellows—they haven't gotten that close. But they have exchanged the first kiss.

Sixty-five million to seventy million years ago, the San Juan Basin was covered by swamps and thick forests. Over time, geological processes converted the vegetation to coal in seams ten to forty feet thick. The same processes preserved the remains of forest and swamp creatures, a wide variety of fish, turtles, crocodiles, lizards, dinosaurs, and primitive mammals—inconveniently, in the same place as the coal.

San Juan Basin fossils are world renowned, according to paleontologist Barry Kues, a University of New Mexico associate professor, because they record the transition from the end of the dinosaurs to the appearance of the first mammals. If an asteriod's collision with the Earth or some other cataclysmic event eliminated dinosaurs, the event could be preserved in the Basin's fossil record, Kues believes. "This is a tremendously important period in the record of life. There are only a few other places in the world with the same sequence—Wyoming, Montana, Alberta, and Mongolia. The study of fossils in these rocks has not proceeded as far as it has in other areas. There are enormous amounts of information to be learned about seventy-million-year-old animals and how they lived."

Kues says that at least one-third of the area fossils, including several large dinosaurs, have never been found anywhere else. "Even individual bones can provide a lot of information about what one of these ancient reptiles looked like, how they moved, where they lived," he says. "To a paleontologist, there is a lot of material up there."

Dinosaurs are not the only concern. "Dinosaurs are a type of fossil virtually everyone knows about, but there is an abundance of small fossils—fish, snakes, mammals with tiny teeth—requiring special study and sampling," Kues continues. "These types would never be seen during a stripmine operation, and we know less about mammals than about dinosaurs."

When Kues and BLM paleontologist Keith Rigby surveyed the area for the BLM in 1977, they acquired an appreciation of the enormity of fossil resources, of coal resources, and of the resulting problem. Then they set out to educate the public, the government, and the coal companies.

"There were times when I suspected that all the work to try to explain the importance of the resource to the BLM and the coal companies would be to no avail," Kues recalls, sitting in his small university office crammed with books, papers, and rocks that overflow his shelves onto the floor. Rigby now is at Notre Dame University. "There were fits and starts and bad feelings between people who had different ideas about what should happen up there."

Discussion among developers, academics, state agencies, and environmentalists eventually hatched an unprecedented agreement: Mining operators agreed in late August to consult the state about any planned activity that could affect fossils and other prehistoric remains.

Because of the new appreciation of New Mexico fossils, a natural history museum is under construction in Albuquerque, the first such museum to be built in the United States in this century. (The last was Denver's Museum of Natural History, built in 1898.) A fund-raising campaign was launched once it became known that there were more New Mexico fossils in the Smithsonian Institution than at home.

Still undecided is the disposition of the seventy-million-year-old Fossil Forest, where petrified logs and stumps remain in their original positions, along with fossils of animals that inhabited the forest. The Fossil Forest offers a unique opportunity to study a cross section of the living community as it was then, Kues says. Even though the three-acre site impressed James Watt on a recent tour, it is too small to be classified as a Wilderness Study Area. Arch Mineral Corporation, which holds the parcels, has scheduled them for development in ten years but has promised paleontologists the chance for thorough study first.

The Basin is estimated to contain 250,000 archaeological sites, which document human occupation of the area from the area from the sophisticated, pre-Columbian Anasazi to the first Navajos in the seventeenth century. The crown jewel is Chaco Canyon, where an advanced civilization built a complex of pueblos and roads after A.D. 500, conducted a brisk trade with Indians as far away as Mexico, then mysteriously disappeared around 1300. Coal development could take place ten miles from delicate veneered walls that rival those of the Aztecs and Incas.

To keep from running afoul of federal and state laws protecting these antiquities, coal and uranium companies, utilities, and pipeline builders have employed a small army of independent, "cowboy" archaeologists to survey and catalog sites in preparation for development. Where site avoidance is impossible, they excavate. As a result, the state archaeologist's office has been logging new sites at the rate of seven hundred a month for several years. Some major Chaco outlier sites and roads were discovered during surveying for high voltage transmission lines.

Dr. Joe Winter, director of contract archaeology for the University of New Mexico, isn't thrilled about impending energy development, but he admits, "Most of the knowledge we're gaining now is the result of development. Every day they carry out a project in the San Juan Basin area, it results in significant findings that increase our knowledge of pre-Anasazi, Anasazi, and early Navajo Indians. On the other hand, we're reaching a point where so much development could go on that we will have more work and information generated than we can properly analyze."

New Mexico archaeologists say energy developers have been more cooperative than the federal government. The state archaeologist, preservation officer, the University of New Mexico, and the New Mexico Archaeological Council have heatedly protested what they believe are attempts by Reagan appointees in the Office of Surface Mining and the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation to dismantle protective legislation. The two agencies are acting by presidential mandate to remove perceived impediments to mineral development.

"New Mexico has some of the most unbelievable archaeology in the entire world," laments Carol Condie, president of the Archaeological Council. "In the San Juan Basin, for instance, we have a range of sites from 12,000 B.C. to the present. Because there really isn't any water out there, it has not been heavily inhabited. No one has lived out there except Indians. Until a few years ago, it was archaeologically pristine. It would provide us with a lot of information about how people have made it or not made it. We don't want to see it just get torn to hell and not know what it was."

The Sierra Club began trying to gain official protection for certain areas of the San Juan Basin in 1971, first as a county park, then as a national Outstanding Natural Area, and finally as Wilderness Study Area, according to spokesman Dave Glowka. The latter designation has been recommended for two areas, the 3,968-acre Bisti Badlands, thirty-five miles south of Farmington, and the nearby 19,922-acre De-na-zin. A bill to that effect, which has been supported by coal companies, was introduced in Congress by New Mexico Senator Pete Domenici. One firm, Sunbelt Mining Company, has been negotiating with the BLM to trade its leases within the proposed wilderness study areas for other nearly leases.

Environmentalists are demanding that a third area, the Ah-she-sli-pah, be granted wilderness study status, which would bring the total protected area to 30,453 acres. A competing bill including the third area has been introduced by New Mexico Representative Bill Richardson and is supported by the state.

The BLM argues against wilderness status for the Ah-she-sli-pah, saying the same geologic features are replicated in the other areas. Coal operators say the region's most accessible coal is in the Ah-she-sli-pah and that wilderness designation would keep them from mining adjacent areas because of access problems.

Paul Biderman, secretary of the New Mexico Department of Energy and Minerals, calls BLM and industry arguments "ludicrous" and says, "The fact that certain features may be duplicated elsewhere doesn't mean they're not unique where they are. To narrow down to two areas and destroy the rest would be irresponsible for future generations' appreciation of natural beauty."

Biderman is one member of the "green machine" that took over New Mexico government with the election of governor Toney Anaya in 1982. Anaya bumped businessmen from the state's Environmental Improvement Board and replaced them with environmental activists. He installed former national Sierra Club president Brant Calkin as secretary of natural resources, and other cabinet appointments included a consumer activist attorney and an environmental lobbyist.

When Watt announced his massive coal lease plan, which included a December sale date for 1.5 billion tons of San Juan coal, it surprised Washington but not locals when Anaya broadsided the plan. Anaya handed Charles Luscher, BLM director for New Mexico, a three-inch-thick response from thirteen state agencies detailing alleged deficiencies of the sale, such as inadequate Environmental Impact Statements and market projections.

Anaya charged that Watt was "hell-bent on getting as much of our natural resources into private hands as quickly as possible." State officials projected that massive leasing during an already slack period in coal demand could cost the state $79 million on bonus bids, the fee companies pay for mining rights, because sales would be slow.

The state also has argued that Watt's "fire sale" would encourage speculation instead of mining and that leases would not garner fair market prices. Sunbelt Mining Company spokesman Robert Jackson counters that withholding coal leases "creates artificial gyrations in the marketplace," inflating the price of existing coal and stifling competition among coal producers. As a result, he says, producers are developing properties where the yield is disappointing or where environmental impacts may be greater than sites where leases are frozen. "The harder you squeeze the supply, the greater the speculation," Jackson insists.

Robert Jackson wouldn't be anybody's idea of a Thomas Nast-style industrialist. Thirtyish, slender, genial, candid, Jackson is in many ways similar to the state's Biderman; both are products of the activist sixties and seventies.

Jackson emerged from school with a master's degree in environmental science and became staff environmentalist with Public Service Company of New Mexico. Last year he took over corporate affairs for the utility's subsidiary, Sunbelt Mining, which holds applications or leases on more than 40,000 acres of San Juan coal land. Sunbelt operates the only two existing mines, including the Gateway mine adjacent to the Bisti.

Biderman was a poverty warrior who worked for Legal Services in northern New Mexico, including the Navajo Reservation, and represented consumer interests as an assistant attorney general before assuming his current cabinet position.

State criticism, Biderman emphasizes, is aimed at the BLM, not at industry. Anaya and his cabinet have taken pains to discourage any appearance of being anti-business, a recurring accusation. Biderman says he has beefed up his staff to handle applications and problems quickly and that his emphasis is on negotiation rather than litigation. "We recognize the need for coal leasing, and we're committed to it, but we want orderly development," he says.

Recently, state and BLM officials compromised on a target of 916 million tons of competitively leased coal, down from 1.5 billion. After hearings in November on the BLM's second draft Environmental Impact Statement, Luscher is considering recommendations to the interior secretary.

Despite their concerns, New Mexico officials are more than a little anxious to mine coal. Oil and natural gas revenues have supported the school system for more than two decades, but last year, slack natural gas sales lightened the state's purse considerably and oil revenues also slipped because of depressed market prices. Many mines are closed, and 8,200 miners lost their jobs in New Mexico last year. Even the most optimistic prediction holds that, with recovery, a leaner mining industry will come back minus 2,500 jobs.

Two years ago New Mexico legislators had the luxury of debating how to return a $140 million surplus to the taxpayers. Last year, despite robust federal spending on New Mexico's considerable military installations and a lively tourist economy, the $40 million deficit was eighth among state indebtedness nationwide.

Coal won't solve all New Mexico's problems, but industry officials say it will help. "We have waited many, many years to get access to that coal, and we're only talking about disturbing less than 2 percent of the area," says Sheridan "Rusty" Glen of St. Louis-based Arch Mineral Corporation, referring to the twelve-year-old moratorium on coal development anywhere in the nation. Glen says mining will not occur all at once and that areas mined will be reclaimed.

Glen says he is "dismayed at the amount of controversy generated by San Juan coal leasing," adding, "It's unjustified." He insists coal operators have "bent over backwards" to accommodate everyone's concerns, and "we've seen markets come and go."

Sunbelt's Robert Jackson observes, "If you're not there with the resource when the market decisions are made, you lose the opportunity." New Mexico coal, Jackson explains, is low grade but reasonably close to markets. Transportation has been stalled for years because of Navajo opposition to a rail spur, but plans for a route on different land are proceeding. "Currently, we're behind the large coal producing regions," he notes. "There's a great deal of production capability in place in Wyoming right now. They've got the permits, they've got the mines, the coal, and the transportation."

San Juan Basin coal developers find themselves in a chicken-or-egg situation, says Jackson. "We must demonstrate our ability to deliver to get customers, but we must have customers to build a railroad. There's a problem with who's gonna jump off the deep end."

The Navajo people of Pueblo Pintado have sent resolution after resolution to the BLM, claiming that mining will destroy their homes, their grazing lands, their sacred sites, the graves of their ancestors. They've crowded into meetings at the chapter house, driven to Farmington and Albuquerque to testify through interpreters at hearings. As they were once force-marched by the U.S. Cavalry to detention camps of death and disease far from their homelands, they fear another removal will occur to make way for the white man's dragline.

Pueblo Pintado and sixteen other chapter houses are within the boundaries of coal leases. Most of the 22,072 residents speak only Navajo and live in large family units in the traditional way, supporting themselves raising livestock.

The Checkerboard Area, as these lands are called, is a patchwork of federal, state, private, and tribal ownership. Newer competitive leases provide for mining only with the consent of occupants, but the pre-1976 non-competitive leases offer no such consideration to 226 Navajos. They are considered squatters, although archaeologists says Navajos have been "squatting" in the area for nearly four hundred years.

Cecil Werito, who raises sheep on land occupied by his family for more than a hundred years, recently told the Albuquerque Journal, "We were here before the (federal) laws were made. It's really not fair at all. Even if you move to some other place, it takes a long time before it feels right."

Frank Chee Willetto, the area representative to the Navajo Tribal Council, observes, "We've been out here all these years and nobody bothered us. Then they find coal, and, all of a sudden, they're saying, 'That's mine, that's mine.'"

Unnamed area residents testifying in Navajo at local meetings and state hearings about the proposed mining and power plant were quoted in the Navajo times as saying: "I wish it would never happen, but I have a feeling it will. I am speaking on behalf of the children. I want them to be able to live in harmony."

"I'm not going to give up Pintado no matter what happens," another said. "We don't want our Mother Earth destroyed. . . ."

Sunbelt and Arch say they would not force residents to move. "We don't do that as a matter of policy," Jackson says. "We're not in the business of arm-twisting."

Once, Navajos were given the opportunity to file on 160-acre tracts under the Allotment Act of 1887. But they had always lived on this land; what good was the government's piece of paper? Many didn't file, and they're now legally "unauthorized occupants."

One solution rests with the Navajo and Hopi Settlement Act of 1974, which authorized Navajos living on what is now Hopi land in Arizona to select 400,000 acres of federal land for resettlement. San Juan Basin Navajos could be relocated on the 35,000 acres to be set aside in New Mexico.

Navajos are divided on the subject of development. Some consider strip mining an injury to their Mother Earth; others would like to see mining provide jobs, if it can be done within environmental and cultural constraints. "Navajo people want to be part of this," explains Bureau of Indian Affairs Eastern Agency Supervisor Ed Plummer. "They want to negotiate with the coal companies, not to be promised jobs jobs which never exist. We want to work toward self-sufficiency. For them to be promising us X number of jobs does not resolve our concerns. We have to deal with social problems, housing, roads. . . ."

With 35 percent unemployment and widespread suffering from federal cutbacks, jobs are a touchy subject. Developers always promise jobs, but, as one resident pointed out during a chapter meeting, a sheepherder doesn't just get on a bulldozer.

Leonard Tsosie, a Navajo Legal Services attorney, says, "We learned a lot from uranium development—how they hired Navajos and how they got rid of them at the start of the slump. They used to bring in a bus of outside workers. I wouldn't be surprised to see the coal companies do the same thing."

Sunbelt's Jackson counters that Navajos comprise 25 percent of the workforce at the firm's two mines and insists there is a strong commitment to Navajo hiring.

Even touchier is the subject of gravesite disturbance. Mining companies have offered to move Navajo graves and even to hire a medicine man to perform appropriate ceremonies. To this, a Navajo woman responded that she doubts there is a healer with big enough medicine to diminish this outrage to the dead.

Non-Indians involved with coal leasing in the San Juan Basin have failed to understand the mixture of fear and reverence with which Navajos regard death and anything associated with it. Traditionally, after a family member died, the hogan was sealed and abandoned. As Ray Louis, a spokesman for the Navajo tribe, explains it, "Death and dead people affect Navajos emotionally, mentally, and physically."

"We don't just move graves and hold a ceremony later and say 'rest in peace.'" adds Leonard Tsosie. "There is no such thing in our culture. Anglos do it all the time."

The mining industry has drawn unaccustomed praise from many quarters for its efforts to minimize disturbances in an area whose historic and scientific value they too recognize. But environmentalists and their allies continue to worry about the possible effects of any additional development in the Basin.

It is up to the BLM's Luscher and others to fashion a compromise that accommodates the aesthetic as well as the economic, the past as well as the future, and could serve as a model for resolving similar disputes. The controversy offers a rare opportunity to find a delicate balance between often bitter enemies.●

BOULDER COUNTY JUDICIAL PROCESS

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to introduce today, on behalf of the Colorado congressional delegation, a bill to authorize holding U.S. District Court for the District of Colorado in Boulder, CO. I am joined by the Congressman from Boulder County, Representative TIMOTHY WIRTH.

By amending 28 U.S.C. 85 to add the city of Boulder to the other Colorado cities where Federal court can convene would make the judicial process more accessible to the citizens of Boulder County. The U.S. district court in Denver frequently hears cases in which all or most of the parties, as well as the jurors, are from Boulder County.

Moreover, the University of Colorado Fleming School of Law is located in Boulder. This amendment would provide the students and faculty at the school an easy opportunity to view the Federal district court in action.

The moot courtroom located in Boulder could host an occasional trial or motion hearing at no or low cost. The dean of the law school, eager to see this bill become law, views this use of the courtroom as an excellent teaching tool. Law students could see Federal court in action and learn the procedures and the arguments used by the lawyers.

Under extraordinary circumstances and with prior consent, one trial was recently held in Boulder. It was well attended by the students. Both the presiding Federal judge and the law school dean were pleased with the turnout and suggested making this a regular occurrence.

The Judicial Conference of the United States noted in their March 16-17, 1983, report that H.R. 6974 (the original bill introduced during the 97th Congress) was approved by both the judicial council of the 10th circuit and the district court. Upon the recommendation of the committee, the Conference approved the purpose to be served by any successor bill.

This legislation is a simple, no cost idea that will have tremendous teaching value for Colorado's aspiring law students, and will make the judicial system more convenient for the people of Boulder County.●

CONGRESSIONAL TRIBUTE TO COL. JOHN D. PEARMAN

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, July 27, 1984, we will see yet another outstanding military officer retire from active duty. Col. John D. Pearman, the Director of Civil Engineering for the Space Division at the Los Angeles Air Force Station, will retire after 28 years of service with the U.S. Air Force.

A North Carolinian by birth, John Pearman graduated from North Carolina State University in 1956 with a bachelor of architecture degree and was a distinguished military graduate from the Reserve Office Training Corps Program. He entered active duty with the Air Force after graduation, and has remained on active duty ever since. He continued his education while in the Air Force, receiving a bachelor of science degree in civil engineering from the University of Pittsburgh, and a masters of engineering administration degree from George Washington University. He is also a graduate of the Air War College, the highest level of military education offered by the Air Force.

Colonel Pearman's progression in rank through his career brought assignments of ever-increasing responsibility at a variety of Air Force installations, both in the United States and overseas. These assignments had earlier brought him into the Los Angeles Air Force Station as a project engineer from 1963 until 1968, where he was responsible for tracking and launch facilities in support of space programs. In 1979 he returned to the Los Angeles Air Force Station, to what was then known as the Space and Missile Systems Organization, now the Space Division. He has served since then as Director of Civil Engineering, and in this position played a key role in $600 million worth of construction for the ground facilities required by the space transportation system, better known as the space shuttle, and in the acquisition of 400 units of critically needed military housing for the staff of Los Angeles Air Force Station. It is through this latter mission that I came to know and respect Colonel Pearman's ability, for I have seen him transform the somewhat unkempt and unsightly portions of Fort MacArthur from a collection of miscellaneous buildings in various stages of disrepair into a shining example of what good military housing should look like. I know this has only been a relatively minor part of his overall responsibilities, but it is also a highly visible part. And it reflects very favorably upon his ability and good judgement.

I regret that he has decided to leave the Air Force, and know he will be hard to replace. But that is the system that all of our Services use to keep young blood coming up. As John Pearman and his wife Martha leave the military service, I am pleased to learn that they will not be leaving our area, where he plans to remain active in the engineering field. My wife Lee joins me in wishing the two of them the very best in all of their future endeavors, and we express our appreciation to him for a job well done.●

MISSION TO MOSCOW

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, one of my favorite columnists, Joseph Sobran, has written an excellent column on the recent trip to Russia by a delegation from the National Council of Churches. I commend this insightful piece to the attention of my colleagues:

[From the Washington Times, June 28, 1984]

MISSION TO MOSCOW

(By Joseph Sobran)

A funny thing happened to the National Council of Churches delegation on its recent Potemkin tour of Soviet churches: it unexpectedly encountered some Christians.

The visitors can hardly be blamed for the incident. They had allowed the Soviet regime to arrange their itinerary, which was confined to churches registered with the state. Despite these precautions, at a Baptist church in Moscow, demonstrators raised banners, one of which read: "This is a persecuted church."

After a violent scuffle, the demonstrators were removed. Fortunately, none of the NCC visitors were hurt. They weren't even disturbed. On the contrary, the incident only confirmed their faith in religious freedom under Soviet communism.

The demonstrators, according to the NCC group's leader, Bruce Rigdon, "were asked to leave and they were conducted out by members of the congregation. We believe they are free. I understand that in the United States a situation like this would have been handled by the police."

His words were ingloriously expressive of a certain Western mentality that, brought nose to nose with communist repression, not only excuses it but finds a way to praise it, taking the occasion to whack at Western institutions.

Had the National Council of Churches dropped in on the Roman Coliseum, its spokesmen would no doubt have had kind words for the lions, adding warmly that the emperor was devoted to animals' rights.

The first audible protest against the NCC mission came not from a Christian group, but from the American Jewish Committee, which accused the mission of painting a "rosy picture" of religion under communism. As one who sometimes criticizes Jewish groups for carrying loyalty to their own to excess, I should say here that the excess of a natural virtue such as loyalty is not even comparable to the despicable behavior of Christians who publicly turn their backs on Christian martyrs. In this case, Jews have put Christians to shame. God bless them for it.

Far from condemning communist persecution of Christianity, leading Christian theologians today hunger for "Christian-Marxist dialogue." It is as if St. Maximilian Kolbe had called for "Christian-Nazi dialogue."

A group of "progressive" Catholics, including Hans Küng, has just issued a statement attacking their own church for its enmity to "liberation theology." The statement complains that the Vatican has accused "liberation" theologians of "substituting ideologies for the Gospel, under the influence of Marxism." Apparently the pope is guilty of ecclesiastical McCarthyism.

The truth is that the liberation theologians have been quite open in their attachment to Marxism. One of them, Gustavo Gutierrez, calls for "class struggle" and "social revolution," and approvingly quotes Jean-Paul Sartre's famous remark: "Marxism as the formal framework of contemporary philosophical thought cannot be superseded." Another, Sergio Torres, says, "The process of colonization, liberation, and organization is best understood in Marxist terms." For the influence of this style of theologizing, one need look no further than the priests in Nicaragua's communist ruling junta.

Why be naive? We all know what "liberation" now means. We have seen it defined in Havana, Saigon, Addis Ababa, and Managua. If the Kung group rejects the authority of the Catholic Church, they can find plenty of other institutions where their views will be warmly received. Unless, that is, their real goal is to sap Western institutions.

The Soviet empire is not only geographical but intellectual. Without that empire, Marxism would be just another quaint 19th-century ideology, like social Darwinism. But Kremlin power variously intimidates and energizes Western intellectuals, many of whom strive to legitimize the Marxist critique of the West, even within the churches.

So it was that the NCC group, while abandoning Christian believers to persecution, blamed the United States for the arms race. That's liberation for you.●

IN MEMORY OF A HISTORIC PHONE CALL

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention today to an article printed in the New York Times on June 19, 1984, by Mr. William Kunstler, concerning an early morning phone call he received 20 years ago from Mr. Nathan Schwerner. Mr. Schwerner is a resident of Pelham, NY, which is in my home county of Westchester. That phone call was the start of a 40-day search that would end in the discovery of murdered bodies of Mr. Schwerner's son Micky, and his two coworkers, Andrew Goodman and James Chaney. Mr. Kunstler's article vividly describes how these young men gave their lives for the cause of civil rights, and as we recall their sacrifice and Nathan Schwerner's loss 20 years ago, we should think about the future, and how we can honor their memories by advancing that cause until we are at last all equally free.

I commend this article to the attention of my colleagues.

MISSISSIPPI SUMMER

(By William M. Kunstler)

On Monday, June 22, 20 years ago, I recieved an early morning call from a Nathan Schwerner of Pelham, N.Y. He said: "My son, Mickey, and two other young civil rights workers are missing in Mississippi. They left Meridian in Mickey's car yesterday morning for a trip to Neshoba County and they have not returned or called in. Can you find out for me where they are—my wife and I are worried sick."

As one of the lawyers for the Council of Federal Organizations, a loose coalition of civil rights groups that had recruited some 1,000 student volunteers for its Mississippi black voter registration project, I immediately contacted the Neshoba County sheriff's office in Philadelphia, Miss. A drawling voice informed me that Mickey and his two companions, Andrew Goodman, a white man who was a Queens College anthropology major, and James E. Chaney, a black man who was a local plasterer, had been arrested by a deputy the evening before. The three youths, part of the council's advance party, had been picked up for driving 65 miles per hour in a 30-mile speed zone and held at the county jail "for investigation" until 10:30 P.M. when, after Mr. Chaney, who had been driving Mr. Schwerner's late-model Ford station wagon, paid a $20 fine, they were finally released. They had last been seen leaving town on State Highway 19.

When I reached Bob Moses, the council's director, in Jackson, he told me that Mr. Schwerner, who with his wife, Rita, ran a Meridian biracial community center for the Congress of Racial Equality, and his two friends had left that city at 9:30 A.M. on June 21 to inspect the damage done to the Mount Zion Methodist Church.

The church, the hub of civil rights activities in Neshoba County, had been mysteriously set on fire a week earlier. Although all of the council's personnel had been directed to report their whereabouts regularly whenever they left their home bases, Mr. Moses told me, no calls had been received from the missing men after their departure from Meridian.

Later that day, deputy sheriff Cecil Ray Price, who had arrested the three, said that after their release he had ordered them "to leave the county." Sheriff Lawrence A. Rainey, a burly, tobacco-chewing man, told a newspaper reporter that "if they're missing, they just hid somewhere, trying to get a lot of publicity out of it, I figure." A year later, both men, along with 16 other defendants, would be indicted by a Federal grand jury and charged with conspiracy to intercept and kill Mr. Schwerner, Mr. Goodman and Mr. Chaney. (On Oct. 20, 1967, seven defendants, including Mr. Price and a reputed leader of the Ku Klux Klan, were convicted by an all-white jury. In the other cases, there were hung juries and acquittals.)

The next day, the burned-out station wagon was found in a swamp on Bogue Chitto Creek, 15 miles northeast of Philadelphia, and some 50 feet off State Highway 21. In ensuing weeks, a nationwide search for the three men was conducted. On Aug. 4, after paying $25,000 for a tip from an informer, the Federal Bureau of Investigation found the bodies of the civil rights workers, buried 15 feet apart, under a newly erected earthen cattle pond dam in a thickly wooded area six miles southwest of Philadelphia. Each had been shot to death.

Before the council's "Mississippi summer" ended, some 60,000 new black registrants had been added to the voting roles. This accomplishment, won at such cost, prompted enactment of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, legislation that eventually altered forever the balance of political power in the South. Within one year after its passage, the number of blacks registered in Mississippi and four other Deep South states had increased by almost 50 percent.

Of equal significance, it provided the foundation for the Presidential campaign, two decades later, of the Rev. Jessie Jackson.

Mickey Schwerner, Andy Goodman and Jim Chaney may have died on a back road in pain and terror, but not in vain.

At summer's end, the council's student volunteers returned to their campuses with the knowledge that they had indeed wrought a major miracle. The murders of their comrades had shocked and terrified most of them, as well as their parents, but they had worked on and hoped for the best, somehow sublimating their fears of the worst. That they kept on was undoubtedly because their slain friends had become for them, as Rabbi Arthur J. Lelyveld had put it at Andy Goodman's memorial service, on Aug. 10, 1964: "The eternal evocation of all the hosts of beautiful young men and women who are carrying forth the struggle for which they gave their lives."

It is a requiem to remember on this 20th anniversary of ends and beginnings.●

CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Foreign Affairs Newsletter for June 1984 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

President Reagan believes that the United States has important interests at stake in Central America. It is "the stage for a bold attempt by the Soviet Union, Cuba, and Nicaragua to install communism by force throughout the hemisphere."

The adminstration hopes to subdue insurgency in the region, either by gaining a military victory or by steadily building up a military "shield" behind which economic, social, and democratic reforms may take place. There has been a sharp rise in economic and security aid to the region over the last four years, and a shift in emphasis from economic to security aid. This is most evident in El Salvador, where U.S. security aid has increased from 23% in 1980 to 79% in 1984, while the total amount of requested aid has increased ninefold from $64 million to $571 million. Also, the President has authorized both large-scale maneuvers in the region and the construction of several bases in Honduras.

Has this policy been successful? Despite elections and much more U.S. help, the conflict in El Salvador is deadlocked. The guerrillas control one third of the countryside, a zone of influence which has not changed much in more than a year. The new president, Jose Napoleon Duarte, is committed to land reform, limited contact with the opposition, and a crackdown on death squads, but the right's ability to hem in Mr. Duarte already has been made clear. In Nicaragua, the confrontation between the Sandinistas and the U.S.-backed rebels has grown in scope and intensity over the past three years, and no end is in sight. The Sandinistas have built up their armed forces in response, raising the possibility of wider war. Inside the country, official repression of the private sector, the free press, and the Catholic Church is rising. War threatens Honduras and Costa Rica. All parties in the region support the "Contadora" peace process initiated by Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela, but none has been willing to make the concessions needed to move the talks forward.

I agree with the administration that we have important interests in Central America. We cannot tolerate the establishment of Soviet bases in the region, which might call for defensive military action on our part. We would be troubled if there were unstable or anti-American governments there, though this is not as worrisome as Soviet bases. We also would like to see market-oriented economies, democratic political systems, and more respect for human rights in Central America, part of our general interest in the region's economic, political, and social development.

In my view, however, the President gives a flawed analysis of what is wrong in Central America. The roots of the crisis are not in Moscow, but in local poverty, repression, and inequality. Therefore, Mr. Reagan's prescription for protecting our interests is off the mark. There is no realistic military solution to the crisis, nor is there any direct threat to our security that can justify our growing direct military involvement. Americans properly think that important U.S. interests are at stake in Central America, but opinion polls show that they oppose sending U.S. combat troops to the region. They fear that our deepening military involvement in local disputes will require us to manage the internal security of other nations, a job that is impossible to do at an acceptable cost. They want us to rely on diplomatic and economic measures.

In my view, U.S. policy in Central America should be based on the following principles:

First, we should reject extreme alternatives. Bold military action in the region in the absence of direct threats is unacceptable, as is total disengagement. Such policies could not be pursued for any length of time, and each would be damaging to our long-term interests because each is based on mistaken ideas of what we can and should do.

Second, our present military involvement is too extensive, risks wider conflict, and therefore should be scaled back sharply. The U.S. military buildup in the region has not suppressed guerrilla activity. It forecloses other options, harms the prospects for dialogue, and the chance that our soldiers will be embroiled in open-ended conflict. It is opposed by most parties in the region.

Third, we should continue to provide economic and military assistance in amounts that can be utilized effectively. Additional funds for the region may be useful eventually, but only as there is progress toward peace. These countries also have a limited ability to absorb aid because they lack the infrastructure and technical expertise.

Fourth, we should condition aid so that it promotes U.S. goals. We cannot tell governments how to run their affairs, but our aid ought to go to them only if they are serious about reform. Some observers complain that conditions on aid are signs of congressional "meddling" in foreign policy, but the American people will not support aid unless there is progress toward reform.

Fifth, we should terminate U.S. aid to the rebels fighting the Nicaraguan government. While many Sandinista policies are objectionable and have caused discontent in Nicaragua, the covert war has achieved none of its goals and has given the Sandinistas an excuse for more repression. It is not up to us to fund guerrillas who are trying to overthrow a government that we do not like.

Sixth, we need a new approach to relations with Nicaragua. Secretary Shultz's trip there on June 1 was a good way to begin dispelling mutual distrust and trying to persuade that country not to export revolution. The best idea is to make further bilateral contacts while promoting the Contradora process. Also, we need to shore up the moderates in Nicaragua through nonmilitary means.

Finally, we should press harder for talks in El Salvador. We should urge Mr. Duarte to conduct an internal dialogue with the guerrillas. We cannot support a power-sharing arrangement between the government and the guerrillas, but the guerrillas at least must be included in elections if there is to be peace.●

DAVID BRODY PROFILED IN TASS?

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, David Brody, the Anti-Defamation League's talented Washington representative, has truly "arrived": He has been profiled in TASS. It is not often that the propaganda arm of the Soviet Government does an indepth feature on a prominent member of the B'nai B'rith.

But it seems that just as the Soviets have become accustomed to stealing Western technology, so too do they steal news reports. If the TASS wire service piece on Mr. Brody had a decided New York flavor to it, that was because it was a near verbatim translation of a New York Times article of a year ago, with the noticeable addition of some original Soviet anti-Zionist slurs.

"Washington Talk" columnists William Farrell and Warren Weaver called attention to this Soviet imitation in their article, "Get Me TASS Rewrite," which I ask be printed in the RECORD. I also ask that the original New York Times feature on Mr. Brody, "An 'Unelected Member' of the Senate," be included as well.

I will leave it to TASS to publish the Soviet dispatch.

[From the New York Times, May 14, 1984]

BRIEFING: GET ME TASS REWRITE

(By William E. Farrell and Warren Weaver Jr.)

Soviet correspondents, it seems, can also succumb to the age-old journalistic practice of rewriting their competitors. In a January copy of Sovetskaya Moldaviya, a Kishinev daily, appears a Tass dispatch that bears a striking resemblance to a profile of David Brody, Washington lobbyist for the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, that ran on this page a year ago.

The Tass article begins as almost a translation of The New York Times article, describing how Mr. Brody is accorded senatorial privileges in riding the Capitol subway and elevators. Then phrases that were not in the original begin appearing; B'nai B'rith is described as "completely under the control of Zionist circles" and Mr. Brody as opposing bills "which do not correspond to the interests of Tel Aviv 'hawks.' "

A quotation from Mr. Brody, explaining his position on aid to Israel, is materially altered. The Times version: "You can't win over the Arabs by weakening Israel. If Israel receives the aid it needs, it's in a better position to compromise; a weakened Israel cannot." The Tass version: "You will not get the good will of the Arabs by weakening Israel. If Tel Aviv receives the assistance it needs, then the U.S.A. will be in a better position."

After about 400 words, the Russian writer parts company with the original story altogether to discuss the impact on Congress of "Zionist and pro-Israel organizations" and the current volume of United States aid to Israel. He concludes, entirely on his own, that "all the doors and loopholes on Capitol Hill are open for David Brody, which he sees in his dreams crowned by the Zionist symbol, the six-pointed Star of David."

[From the New York Times, May 26, 1983]

AN "UNELECTED MEMBER" OF THE SENATE

(By Martin Tolchin)

WASHINGTON, May 25.—"Senators Only" said the sign in front of the Capitol subway, but David Brody was waved aboard by Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, whom he thanked for signing a resolution opposing the sale of advanced weaponry to Jordan.

"Senators Only" said the sign above the elevators in the Capitol, but Mr. Brody was escorted onto the car by Senator Jesse Helms, Republican of North Carolina, whom he congratulated on North Carolina State's N.C.A.A. basketball championship.

"Dave Brody is the unelected member of the U.S. Senate," said Senator Charles McC. Mathias Jr., Republican of Maryland, who is an old friend.

Mr. Brody, who will be 67 years old next month, is a short, kinetic institution who seems to know just about everyone in Government. He is the Washington representative of B'nai B'rith's Anti-Defamation League, and, like those of many other lobbyists, his office walls are lined with signed photographs of Presidents and other White House notables. "What would we do without friends? wrote Vice President Bush, and James A. Baker, 3d, the White House chief of staff, called Mr. Brody "oftentimes a strong ally, occasionally a worthy adversary, but always a friend."

It is the Senate, however, where Mr. Brody presses his campaigns, which focus on aid to Israel and support of civil rights legislation. Some other lobbyists for Jewish organizations consider him a loner because of his failure to coordinate his activities with them, and some Capitol Hill people regard him as overly persistent. But most consider him effective.

STRATEGY ON AID TO ISRAEL

"Dave Brody can get in and out of more senators' offices quicker than any person I have ever met in my life," said former Vice President Walter F. Mondale.

Mr. Brody's present concerns include the foreign aid authorization bill, which contains an increase in aid to Israel, and legislation that would put teeth into a fair housing bill. On aid to Israel, Mr. Brody tells senators, "You can't win over the Arabs by weakening Israel. If Israel receives the aid it needs, It's in a better position to compromise; a weakened Israel cannot." On the fair housing bill he tells them, "Without effective enforcement, the bill doesn't mean very much."

Mr. Brody is a full-service lobbyist. He introduces senators to constituents, fund-raisers, reporters and "people I think they should meet." He gives personal advice. He suggests positions on a wide range of subjects, including those in which his organization is disinterested.

"I don't come around only when I need something," Mr. Brody said. "I come around to chat on a general exchange of views. I don't have a heavy-handed, demanding style."

OF FRIENDS AND AWACS

"He's given me valuable advice," said Senator Howell Heflin, an Alabama Democrat. "He has a broad range of interests."

Mr. Brody doesn't seem to care if a senator is a Democrat or Republican, liberal or conservative. Some of his closest friends in the Senate voted for the sale of Awacs to the Saudis, which Mr. Brody lobbied hard, and unsuccessfully, to defeat. "Somebody can be against you on one issue, and with you on the next," he said.

His manner can be direct. When Senator Lloyd Bentsen, the Texas Democrat, told him that Israel needed another Golda Meir, Mr. Brody replied, "Senator, If you have the power to resurrect Golda Meir, that's fine with me, but Golda Meir also had problems with our government."

Mr. Brody does considerable entertaining at home, often bringing senators together with the Israeli Ambassador. Rolf Pauls, former German Ambassador to Washington, once quipped that he had seen more senators at Mr. Brody's home than on the Senate floor.

Mr. Brody, a native New Yorker who is a graduate of City College and Columbia Law School, came to Washington in 1940 to work for the Department of Agriculture, and joined the league in 1949. He was promoted to chief Washington representative in 1965.

His style has evolved over the decades. "Maybe I am a loner," He said. "I have my own style. You have to be able to relate to people, even when you find yourself in disagreement. You have to deal with members as individuals, and know what their concerns are. I'd have a very narrow range of friends if we had to agree on every issue."●

INTRODUCTION OF THE STATE AND LOCAL NARCOTICS CONTROL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1984

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced the State and Local Narcotics Control Assistance Act of 1984. This bill, which provides for grants to State and local governments to assist them in drug law enforcement and drug abuse treatment and prevention activities, is offered in response to the critically high, and unacceptable, levels of drug trafficking and drug abuse in the United States. Fifteen of my colleagues on the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control have joined me as cosponsors of this measure.

Drug trafficking has reached epidemic proportions in the United States; it is estimated to be a $100 billion per year business and is compounded by the economic and social costs to our Nation as a result of those who are adversely affected by illicit drug use. Drug use has escalated dramatically over the past two decades, particularly among our young people, and remains at unacceptably high levels. It is believed that the levels of illicit drug use in the United States exceed those in any other industrialized country in the world.

From 1978 to 1982, cocaine-related deaths and emergency room episodes jumped 300 percent and remain high. Heroin-related hospital emergencies rose nearly 80 percent nationally, and heroin overdose deaths increased almost 50 percent over the same period.

In the area of criminal justice, drug trafficking and drug abuse have inundated our law enforcement capabilities. In March 1983, the Department of Justice's Bureau of Criminal Justice Statistics reported that almost one-third of all State prisoners in 1979 were under the influence of an illegal drug when they committed the crimes for which they were incarcerated. The study also revealed that the more convictions inmates had on their records, the more likely they were to have taken drugs during the month prior to the offense.

Over the course of this Congress, the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, which I chair, has held hearings around the country receiving the opinions, thoughts, and suggestions of local law enforcement officers, judges, correction officials, and drug abuse treatment and prevention specialists on methods to address the burgeoning problems of drug abuse and drug-related crime. In addition, the select committee has closely examined the efforts of our Federal law enforcement agencies to interdict and disrupt the major drug trafficking networks responsible for the importation of narcotics into our country. We have also reviewed the efforts of the State Department and our diplomatic initiatives to eliminate the production of narcotics and other illicit drugs in foreign source countries. I have come to the conclusion, as a result of the select committee's investigations that we have been largely unsuccessful in controlling the production of illegal drugs in source countries, and that we have been totally unable to interdict an appreciable amount of illegal drugs coming into this country through Federal law enforcement efforts. As a result, we have been unable to make a significant reduction in the available supply of narcotics on the streets of the United States.

What has happened, is that our local law enforcement agencies and drug abuse service programs have been left with the responsibility to respond to the increasing volume of illegal drugs being trafficked across the country and related criminal activity, as well as the great public health care demand that addicts and substance abusers create.

Our local police, prosecutors, judges, jails, and prisons have all been overwhelmed by a continuous surge of drug-related criminal defendants. The criminal justice system, as a result, has been forced to make the critical decisions of arrest, bail, probation, and sentence based on the size of the case load. Drug trafficking has forced our local criminal justices systems to be concerned with the quantity of defendants, rather than the quality of justice.

States and localities are also simply unable to meet the growing demand for drug abuse treatment and prevention services. This is especially true in many of our Nation's large urban areas that are hardest hit by drug abuse. Over 94 percent of the States responding to a 1983 survey conducted by the National Association of State Alcohol & Drug Abuse Directors reported an unmet need for treatment and prevention services in their States.

The inability of our diplomatic initiatives to control the production and trafficking of illegal drugs abroad, as well as the ineffectiveness of our Federal interdiction and enforcement efforts to restrict the entry and distribution of narcotics in our country, make it urgently necessary that the Federal Government comes to the assistance of State and local agencies that are bearing the large burden of responding to drug abuse in America.

The legislation I have introduced today authorizes $750 million annually in fiscal years 1986 through 1990 to help States and localities increase their efforts to control drug abuse and drug trafficking. The funds provided under my bill would be made available to States on the basis of demonstrated need, taking into account the severity of drug trafficking and abuse within a State and the availability of State and local resources to resolve these problems.

Specifically, the bill authorizes the Attorney General to make grants to States for five general purposes related to increasing the level of State and local drug law enforcement. These purposes include: providing additional personnel, equipment, facilities, training, and supplies to State and local narcotics enforcement units for more widespread apprehension of drug criminals; providing similar support to increase the prosecution of narcotics cases in State courts; providing additional support to State courts to increase the number of narcotics cases that can be adjudicated and reduce delays that often leave drug peddlers free to ply their trade pending trial; increasing the capacity of State correctional facilities to hold convicted drug felons and providing support to establish and improve drug treatment and rehabilitation services to drug-dependent State offenders; and providing increased support for States to eradicate illicit drug cultivation.

The bill includes $125 million a year for each of these general purposes and gives the Attorney General limited flexibility to shift funds among these purposes. This will allow the Attorney General to increase funds available for purposes that may have a greater need, but the bill will also assure that funds are used by States to increase all components of their criminal justice systems.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of Health and Human Services to make grants to States to increase the availability of drug abuse prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation programs. The bill authorizes $125 million a year over the same 5-year period for this purpose. As a result of Federal budget cuts, States are currently unable to meet the demand for treatment and rehabilitation, a demand which is growing. With the increased drug law enforcement activity this bill will make possible, the need for additional treatment capacity will grow. My bill is intended to assure that these increased drug abuse services will be available to help those who need and want such help. Efforts must also be increased to prevent our citizens, especially our young people, from becoming involved with drugs.

The effects of drug abuse and drug trafficking continue to grow, sapping our Nation of its most valuable resource—our people—and threatening the very security of our country. We can never hope to bring these problems under control unless we are willing to make a serious, long-term commitment to provide the substantial resources needed to do the job. My bill makes a strong start toward the goals of eliminating the drug trade that pervades our streets, helping drug abuse victims become productive members of our society and preventing the further spread of drug abuse. I urge my colleagues to join me in passing this vital legislation.●

NEW SENIOR JOBS PROGRAM COULD HELP SCHOOLS WITH ASBESTOS PROBLEM

HON. COOPER EVANS

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. EVANS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in recent days President Reagan has signed into law an important piece of legislation that, over time, will help make the United States a cleaner and safer place in which to live.

Called the Environmental Programs Assistance Act, it authorizes the Federal Government to hire and train older Americans for a variety of crucial tasks in the fight against pollution and hazardous materials.

I drafted this legislation and introduced it in the House of Representatives nearly 4 years ago. My purposes then, as now, were twofold:

First, to expand the manpower aviable for enforcing and monitoring the Nation's environmental laws and regulations;

And, second, to provide meaningful employment for thousands of senior citizens who want to stay active in their communities and supplement their retirement income.

Over the years, the proposal has won the backing of several national environmental organizations, as well as national groups that represent millions of senior citizens. The measure finally passed the Senate in March 1984, and was approved by the House in late May.

My bill was patterned after a Federal demonstration project conducted in my home State of Iowa and nine other States over a 6-year period during the 1970's. The Environmental Protection Agency, in cooperation with its State counterparts, employed older workers for water-quality, pesticide, and hazardous-waste surveys, as well as for air-emission and noise-abatement tests.

The Federal project came to an end in the late 1970's and until now had never been reauthorized by Congress. Followup studies showed an average labor cost savings to the Government of about 16 percent when seniors participated in the surveys and tests.

Seniors hired for the program reported improvements in their quality of life because the project gave them a chance to work with people their own age on something considered important to the welfare of the country as a whole.

EPA has continued to employ a handful of senior citizens on an ad hoc basis and already is making plans to take advantage of the opportunities offered by this new law.

In recent days, I have met with EPA Administrator Bill Ruckelshaus to share my own views on how the talents and skills of America's senior citizens can be put to good use on an environmental problem of interest to school administrators and parents of young children.

People will differ over which of the many environmental issues in this country are the most important or deserve the most attention. But to my mind, the asbestos problem in our public and private elementary and secondary schools must rank near the top of the agenda.

Asbestos is a known human carcinogen and there is substantial medical evidence which suggests that exposure to even low levels of asbestos over time can cause cancer.

Federal, State, and local health agencies have recognized for some time the need to survey the Nation's school buildings in an effort to minimize the potential for exposing school-aged children to materials containing asbestos.

Iowa has been a leader in this effort, starting with a statewide inspection of all school buildings in 1980 to determine the extent of the asbestos problem and continuing with State and local efforts to correct it.

Corrective measures are either completed or well underway in about two-thirds of the State's school districts which identified asbestos material in their buildings, according to State department of public health officials.

At the national level, EPA has conducted a massive education campaign over the past several years to alert schools to the hazards of asbestos and to instruct them on corrective action.

Materials containing asbestos were used for wall and ceiling insulation and acoustical padding, as well as for protective wrapping on pipes, boilers, and hot water heaters, in commercial and public buildings of all types, particularly those built between 1946 and 1975.

In 1982 EPA issued new, tough regulations that required school districts in every State to survey their buildings for asbestos materials, including walls, ceilings, pipes, and boiler rooms.

The survey results were to be reported directly to parents, teachers, and maintenance staffs, and records containing a summary of the results, EPA asbestos manuals and the like were to be kept on the school premises.

The deadline for complying with these Federal regulations was June 28, 1983. Since that time, EPA's regional offices have been conducting onsite inspections to find out if the school districts have conformed to the regulatory requirements.

The EPA inspections—which will take years to complete—have so far shown a disturbing trend across the country. The Kansas City region—which includes Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska—has found, for example, that 80 to 85 percent of the school districts surveyed by EPA have failed to comply fully with the regulations.

An EPA official there has indicated that the rate of compliance in the asbestos-in-school rules is the worst he has ever seen in an environmental program.

Nationwide, an estimated 60 to 65 percent of the school districts are out of compliance with the rules, according to EPA officials in Washington.

To date, EPA in Kansas City has spot checked only 130 school districts out of 2,500 districts in the four State region. Only 16 of those visited are in the State of Iowa.

Nationwide, EPA has surveyed 1,226 school districts, only a fraction of the 16,000 public and 10,000 private and parochial districts across the country.

Fortunately for my constituents, the situation in Iowa is better than in most other States. Although the State-initiated survey in 1980 did not include inspections of pipe and boiler wrappings, it did examine walls and ceilings.

The survey identified 320 school buildings in the State's 439 school districts that contained some asbestos material in walls and/or ceilings; 48 of the 68 public school districts and five private schools in the Third Congressional District reported some problems with asbestos.

It is nuclear, however, how many schools have met all of the requirements of the Federal regulations. EPA officials believe that the rate of compliance in Iowa is consistent with other States in the Kansas City region.

It should be noted that EPA's regulations did not require schools to undertake corrective measures once asbestos was found. Rather, the agency envisioned that local districts, working with parents and staff, would initiate the necesary steps on their own.

Furthermore, the early findings from EPA's inspections indicate that the No. 1 reason for noncompliance by the schools is the result of failure to notify parents and teachers, rather than failure to complete the necessary surveys.

According to Iowa health officials, about one-third of the schools which identified asbestos in their buildings have completed some form of corrective measures. Another third have begun to take corrective steps while a third have done little if anything to resolve the problem.

The Waterloo School District in Waterloo, has been especially aggressive in trying to correct the problem here. Over the past 2 years, the district has spent about $50,000 to encapsulate, or cover, walls and ceilings that contain asbestos materials.

Other districts, however, have been slow to respond because of a shortage of funds and expertise.

With this in mind, I am conducting meetings in my district with representatives of PTA's, school districts, senior citizen organization, public health agencies, Federal job training programs, and other groups concerned about the asbestos issue.

I have developed the rough outline of a proposal that I think could dramatically step up in the Federal, State, and local efforts to identify and correct asbestos problems in our public and private schools.

In broad terms, my proposal would:

Dramatically increase the number of jobs available to senior citizens to help schools survey their buildings and notify parents and staff, in accordance with EPA regulations; older workers could also be employed to conduct ongoing inspections in those schools which have chosen to encapsulate, rather than remove, asbestos from walls and ceilings;

Create federally funded job training programs for unemployed younger workers to assist schools in their asbestos abatement programs; it is my hope that local service delivery areas of the Job Training Partnership Act will develop employment programs that would help lower the cost of abatement for our school districts.

The passage of the senior environmental jobs program comes at a crucial time, in light of the compliance rate with the asbestos regulations and the slow pace of EPA's compliance surveys.

Since January, EPA's regional offices have been allowed to hire a few additional senior workers for the asbestos program. In Kansas City, five senior citizens are now working on this problem. Many more are needed, however, to speed up the compliance effort.

Furthermore, EPA already is considering a new round of asbestos rules that will make it even tougher for schools to meet the Federal mandate.

Abatement programs are only now getting underway in most schools across the country. Most are choosing to encapsulate walls and ceilings with a latex paint or 1 of about 35 other similar products.

The lifespan of latex paint is about 5 to 8 years which means that encapsulation will require ongoing inspection and maintenance. Removal of asbestos costs an average of $3 per square foot, or about two to three times the cost of encapsulation.

Over the long term, however, removal may be a cheaper solution than coating the asbestos material with paint and other hardening materials. But even encapsulation is beyond the reach of many school budgets without assistance from other State and Federal agencies.●

NATIONAL CAMPAIGN TO SAVE THE ABM TREATY

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty represents a milestone in the history of attempts to control the arms race. As an attempt to curb an expensive and dangerous expansion of the arms race, it enjoyed strong bipartisan support within the United States. Tragically, the ABM treaty today is seriously threatened by new Reagan administration weapons programs such as the "Star Wars" Ballistic Missile Defense Program and the HOE anti-ballistic missile system recently tested by the Army.

The ABM treaty grew out of a sober realization that a nuclear war cannot be won, and that the two nuclear superpowers have a mutual interest and a common responsibility in attempting to control the nuclear arms race. The national security considerations that led President Nixon to conclude this treaty are all the more compelling today.

Recognizing the danger to the ABM treaty, a group of Americans distinguished by their contributions to national security and arms control has joined with a group of nongovernment organizations to initiate a National Campaign To Save the ABM Treaty.

I commend to my colleagues the Statement in Support of the ABM Treaty, and ask that this statement and a list of endorsing individuals and organizations be printed at this point in the RECORD.

STATEMENT IN SUPPORT OF THE ABM TREATY

The ABM Treaty of 1972 between the U.S. and the Soviet Union bans nationwide systems to defend against ballistic missile attack. This Treaty was approved by a Senate vote of 88-2.

The fundamental premise underlying the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty was that nuclear war is not survivable and that a search for technological solutions to alter this reality would be both futile and dangerous. This basic assumption was valid in 1972 and remains valid today. The Treaty permits deployment of only one limited, land-based anti-ballistic missile system; it explicitly prohibits the development, testing, or deployment of any space-based ABM system or component. The Treaty has contributed to maintaining the peace for over a decade and enhancing both U.S. and Soviet security because it prohibits wide-spread defensive systems which might lead either side to conclude erroneously that it could survive a nuclear conflict—thereby undermining the mutual restraint inherent in the conviction that there can be no victor in a nuclear war.

A year ago President Reagan called upon the scientific community to develop an impenetrable defense, although such a system is banned under international law. A nationwide ABM system is now an explicit goal of this Administration with generously funded programs.

This expanded development and testing program for strategic defense will soon collide with the restrictions imposed by the ABM Treaty. Tests are to be conducted to demonstrate the technological feasibility of various elements of a missile defense system. This will end the most significant arms control agreement in existence.

Whenever either superpower has developed a new weapons system, the other has followed suit. If one develops a nationwide ballistic missile defense, the other will do the same. Both sides would also accelerate their offensive weapons programs to neutralize the defensive systems. The result would be a renewed arms race in both offensive and defensive nuclear weapons, emphasis by both sides on nuclear war-fighting strategies, and an erosion of our security. The futility, risk and cost of this effort demonstrate why it is in our national interest to preserve, and where possible, strengthen the present ban on nationwide systems.

Preserve the 1972 ABM Treaty as a matter of highest national security priority!

COMMENDING ROBSTOWN'S TREVINOS

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to talk about the qualities of community service, family, and love. The reason I bring these now-rare topics up is because I have in my district a couple who still embodies these very traits.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Trevino celebrated their 45th wedding anniversary on Monday, June 25; four and a half decades is a long time for two people to be together. I think that these people deserve a salute for this accomplishment.

Too often we read about couples who split up within months, or even days, of their marriage. With that in mind, it is so refreshing to know people such as the Trevinos, who are a model for all Americans because they have embodied the traits which made America great.

The Mexican-American community of Robstown is very proud of these two outstanding citizens. Andrew is a retired postmaster who held that Government position for over four decades. Adelina is a retired kindergarten teacher who spent many years encouraging the young to learn. They are also well-respected community leaders in Robstown. They worked through the Wesley House Community Center for many years.

The Trevinos have been successful parents in addition to being community leaders. Their well-raised children have gone on to be productive members of society. Their son Andrew, Jr., is now a successful engineer who owns a personal firm in Houston and their daughter Norma Jean is continuing in the footsteps of her mother. She has become an educator in Robstown.

I would like to recognize these two people, Andrew and Adelina, as a symbol of our American virtues: family closeness, hard work, and love.

I wish them many more years of marital bliss.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me this time.●

TRIBUTE TO RAFE POMERANCE, RETIRING PRESIDENT OF FRIENDS OF THE EARTH

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, last night I went to a farewell party for Rafe Pomerance, who is retiring as President of Friends of the Earth. Rafe has been with Friends of the Earth for 10 years, and has been president for the last 4. The invitation to the party said that Rafe was stepping "down" from Friends of the Earth but not "out" of the environmental movement.

I would just like to take the opportunity to reflect on the 10 years this man has contributed to protection of the environment. Rafe created the Clean Air Coalition in 1973 to preserve the Clean Air Act of 1970 in the face of terrific pressure to weaken it generated by the oil embargo. For 5 years he was the principal lobbyist for the coalition while working at Friends of the Earth. The Clean Air Coalition was the first environmental coalition that brought together environmentalists, labor, health groups, and scientists to shape a major complex piece of regulatory legislation. It has been the model for later successful coalition efforts on the Alaska Lands Act and the Clean Water Act.

The environmental movement has produced some wonderful environmental leaders over the last decade, but Rafe Pomerance stands out as a giant among them. He combines all the best qualities of a successful lobbyist: he is a man with a strong vision and commitment to his goals, a shrewd strategist with a dogged determination to win, and a totally engaging and disarming personality that could charm the right vote out of the crustiest smokestack lover.

What is really special about this man, however, is what I'd call a kind of gift to see ahead into the future for the emerging issues. During the 1977 fight on the Clean Air Act, it was Rafe who forced the Congress to recognize that visibility is a basic American right, that we should be able to visit our great national parks of the Southwest such as the Grand Canyon knowing that we will be guaranteed the right to look out over that magnificent vista without its being violated by a cloud of smog. We take that right for granted, but we didn't always, and it was Rafe's tremendous commitment to visibility that has made it an accepted American right.

With victory in 1977, Rafe saw that his work wasn't over and that acid rain and carbon dioxide were emerging as problems that would take on global proportions. He has spent the last 5 years bringing the problems of acid rain and the greenhouse effect to the attention of the American public and to our public policymakers. It is only a matter of time before this body passes comprehensive acid rain control legislation, and when it does, a number of us will feel Rafe's hand in it, no matter where he is and what he is doing.

Rafe's interests have always been far reaching. He doesn't fit the image of a backpacking wilderness buff so many associate with environmentalism. He came out of the welfare rights movement to the fledgling Urban Environment Conference, a new organization of the early seventies that forged an alliance between environmentalists, labor, and urban groups. He was a founder of the American Rivers Conservation Council, the first organization devoted to the preservation of our wild rivers, and he has been a leader in bringing the environmental movement into the most serious environmental issue of all, the prevention of nuclear war.

Luckily, the environmental movement is unlikely to lose Rafe Pomerance, and he will pop up soon in a new role. But until he does, we will sorely miss this outstanding leader with as delightful a style and sense of humor as I have ever known.●

NATIONAL INDEPENDENT LABORATORY WEEK

HON. SANDER M. LEVIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a joint resolution to designate October 13, 1984, through October 19, 1984, as "National Independent Laboratory Week."

The more than 3,000 independent laboratories in this country provide objective and efficient information to the people of our Nation and play a vital role in the U.S. economy. Hundreds of thousands of firms of all sizes rely on independent laboratories for data essential to the conduct of their businesses. Independent testing laboratories also contribute significantly to the health and safety of the American public. In fact, many governmental initiatives of the past decade to assure the health and safety of the American people have relied significantly on the capabilities of independent, privately owned laboratories.

As defined by the American Council of Independent Laboratories, the national association of these companies, an independent laboratory provides professional research development, investigation, testing, sampling, analysis, and/or consultation services to the public. These institutions produce objective reports free of any influences which might prejudice the judgment or action of the laboratory's management or employees. They are both models of disinterested, scientific inquiry and shining examples of efficient, responsive small businesses relying on the creativity, ingenuity, and superior talents of their employees.

As disinterested third parties, independent laboratories can provide professional services in the fields of engineering and the sciences to investigate, inspect, and test commodities and materials without bias. Independent laboratories also provide an invaluable service to other small businesses. A small manufacturer without the technical capability to conduct needed analyses can turn to the independent laboratory, obtain those analyses, and be free to find more efficient uses for his money than establishing in-house testing facilities.

Independent commercial laboratories serve as catalysts and problem solvers in the U.S. industrial-commercial mix. The research, analysis, and design work of these scientists and engineers help clients to develop new products and processes, improve the quality of existing products, and find timely answers to perplexing—and costly—problems.

The U.S. Congress should recognize the important contributions independent laboratories make in our country as well as calling attention to the qualities of ingenuity, creativity, and efficiency these companies exemplify. I urge my colleagues to join me in designating the week of October 13, 1984, as "National Independent Laboratory Week."●

REPUDIATION OF THE REAGAN ADMINISTRATION EFFORTS TO WEAPONIZE SPACE

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, on June 12, Charles T. Manatt, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, delivered a strong and courageous statement repudiating President Reagan's plans to weaponize space. His statement accurately reflects the sentiments of many Members of Congress who are deeply troubled by the prospects of an arms race in space. I think it is important for us to recognize Chairman Manatt's leadership and foresight on this crucial issue.

I would, therefore, like to submit for the RECORD Chairman Manatt's statement, as well as a letter that several of my colleagues and I sent to him—commending his action.

RONALD REAGAN'S COMMITMENT TO PREPARE FOR WAR IN SPACE DANGEROUSLY JEOPARDIZES AMERICA'S SECURITY AND DRAMATICALLY INCREASES THE RISK OF NUCLEAR WAR—THAT COMMITMENT MUST BE REVERSED

(By Charles T. Manatt)

One of the most frightening choices ever to confront America will be made in the 1984 election. That choice is whether or not Americans will give their mandate to prepare for war in space.

Ronald Reagan has precipitously committed America to prepare for war in space despite the fact that no mandate of the people supports his initiative.

His commitment is being vigorously pursued by programs to develop weapons in space for the first time.

The weapons now being developed by Ronald Reagan are, therefore, a commitment to propel America through a dangerous threshold toward war in space. Their anticipated deployment would be so provocative that it could risk preemptive attack.

Ronald Reagan's unilateral commitment to prepare for war in space now challenges every American with a clear choice. In November, we will make an historic decision on the fate of our own security and the future of humanity: Either we ratify Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space; Or, instead, we vote for a mandate to stop war in space before the arms race that can cause it starts.

All Americans must be aware of the consequences of their choice:

Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space dangerously jeopardizes America's security and dramatically increases the risk of nuclear war.

America's security is founded on a bipartisan consensus on principles of national defense. The consensus includes five strategic tenets. Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space violates all five. These tenets seek stability and security. Ronald Reagan seeks the illusion of superiority and mastery.

These five tenets bear reviewing to document why Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space moves America toward nuclear war on earth. The five tenets are:

(1) Deterrence is our primary form of defense.—Deterrence means the best defense is a good offense.—A good offense is one that can survive an attack and still retaliate with a devastating counterattack. It, therefore, deters attack against us. But a good offense is not so large or destructive to threaten a knock-out blow. A good offensive, consequently, helps to promote stability but does not guarantee it. Stability also requires arms limitation and control.

Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space would abandon deterrence. In its place Ronald Reagan would have a commitment to superiority, the illusory ability to threaten a knock-out blow. That commitment abandons the search for stability in favor of a pursuit of confrontation.

(2) Defensive weapons are inherently destabilizing and are the greatest source of strategic provocation.—A commitment to develop defensive weapons accelerates the offensive arms race. It creates an incentive to use more powerful offensive weapons to overwhelm potential defenses. The ABM Treaty of 1972, negotiated by a Republican president, represents the profound importance of this tenet in the American strategic consensus.

Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space would abrogate the ABM Treaty by the testing of defensive weapons. His commitment would make defensive weapons the primary basis for American security even though their provocation would dangerously jeopardize American's safety.

(3) Arms control is essential to America's security.—Strategic security cannot be achieved without stability. And stability cannot be achieved without controlling offensive arms and banning defensive weapons. Arms control is not an alternative to strategic stability, it is indispensable to it.

Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space would ultimately have the effect of eliminating arms control as a tenet of America's strategic consensus. Development of defensive weapons and the abrogation of the ABM Treaty would provoke an accelerated offensive arms race. That acceleration would be almost impossible to limit by arms controls so long as defensive weapons had strategic primacy.

(4) An attack on Western Europe, our NATO allies, is an attack on the United States.—There should be no decoupling of our strategic posture from that of Western Europe.

Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space would have the effect of decoupling NATO from the defensive shield he wants to erect for America. That shield would not protect against cruise missiles, low-flying bombers and flat trajectory SS-20 missiles to which NATO might be especially vulnerable.

(5) Outer space must remain outside the area of strategic competition.—Competition in an area in which technological challenges are so formidable promotes instability rather than stability. The 1967 Outer Space Treaty represents America's commitment to this important tenet. The Limited Nuclear Test Ban Treaty of 1963 is also an historic landmark in this commitment.

Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space would make space a new frontier in a pursuit of his goal of strategic superiority.

As the violation of these tenets of America's consensus on national defense serves to domonstrate, Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space is the most radical departure from a strategic consensus ever made unilaterally by an American president.

This commitment is all the more dangerous in jeopardizing America's security because substantial doubts exist among scientists that the weapons Ronald Reagan is developing are in fact technologically feasible.

Their possible ineffectiveness does not, however, minimize their provocativeness. Since their effectiveness would not be known until they were actually used, it would have to be assumed that they would function as intended.

Fundamental of the tenets of America's strategic consensus is the avoidance of provocation. Provocation, our consensus affirms, endangers America's security by inciting arms escalation against us. Provocation begets provocation and, thereby, creates greater instability which makes our own security more difficult to assure Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space is a radical and extreme provocation. By this commitment, Ronald Reagan reaffirms his administration's often stated determination to make nuclear war winnable.

His provocative pursuit of superiority depends on placing two categories of weapons in space for the first time.

One category includes weapons to destroy satellites. Their provocative capability would knock out satellites that are essential to military command communications, gathering intelligence, and verifying arms control treaties, providing as well as a host of civilian purposes like television transmissions and long distance telephone calls.

The other category—far more provocative in its capability though farther away in possible deployment—includes defensive weapons in space, perhaps thousands of them, to intercept and destroy Soviet missiles.

If these space based defensive weapons were as effective and accurate as Ronald Reagan intends them to be, they would disarm the Soviet Union.

So extreme is this provocation that an equally extreme response must be expected from the Soviet Union.

Ronald Reagan maintains that he does not intend for his commitment to prepare for war in space to be regarded as an "aggressive policy." He also maintains that his commitment seeks neither "military superiority or political advantage," but, instead, a world peace.

Either Ronald Reagan does not understand the provocative consequences of his commitment to prepare for war in space or he is deliberately attempting to mislead the people of America. In either case, he has put our lives in jeopardy.

His Secretary of Defense has said that if the Soviet Union had the capability that Ronald Reagan seeks to deploy in space it would be "one of the most frightening prospects" imaginable.

Why is our having that capability said to be a gesture of peace while the Soviet Union having it is a "frightening prospect?"

And what greater incentive could the Soviet Union have to accelerate the development of defensive weapons in space than the provocative commitment by Ronald Reagan to be the first to deploy such weapons?

To minimize the controversy, Ronald Reagan suggests that his commitment to prepare for war in space is merely a research program, a long term inquiry into a formidable technical problem.

But his commitment is obviously not just another laboratory experiment. Rather, it is equal to or greater than eight Manhattan Projects of "staggering" costs, as the Pentagon's research chief told Congress. It has the urging of the presidency to be accomplished "before the end of this century," or barely fifteen years hence.

It is precisely this program of "staggering" costs backing up Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space that makes it so radically provocative.

Ronald Reagan's rhetoric is already provocative in the extreme in its call to render Soviet weapons "impotent." But his commitment to a down payment of $25–$40 billion over the next five years for what are estimated to be costs ultimately measured in the trillions of dollars is nothing less than a radical provocation.

By the end of the next presidential term, almost five years from now, a point of no return in the momemtum toward preparations for war in space is likely to be reached.

In those five years, about one third of the time would have elapsed of the period Ronald Reagan estimates to be required to develop deployable defensive weapons in space.

The response of the Soviet Union cannot be predicated with certainty. But one convenient and logical option open to them should be expected.

They can drastically accelerate development of offensive weapons having more massive destructiveness and increasing technological sophistication.

The greater the Soviet's offensive capability, the more difficult the task of creating defensive weapons in space to intercept and destroy them.

Conversely, the more provocative Ronald Reagan's emphasis in developing space-based defensive weapons, the greater the incentives for the Soviet Union to accelerate their offensive weapons development to be able to overwhelm those defenses.

An entirely new arms race would result. It would be of such massive proportions and frightening volatility that, by comparison, the past two decades of arms competition would be dwarfed.

Because the consequences of his commitment to prepare for war in space are so extreme, the election of Ronald Reagan to the upcoming presidential term would in effect become a mandate to move America closer to the possibility of nuclear war.

Thankfully for the security of America, Ronald Reagan's unilateral commitment to prepare for war in space is still reversible. A mandate to reverse that commitment can still halt the jeopardizing of American security before a point of no return is reached. The Democratic Party asks for that mandate from the people of America. We ask that mandate for vital reasons.

Ronald Reagan is moving America in the direction of nuclear war by giving legitimacy to provocation.

The question before us is not whether we are safe today than we were four years ago. We know we are not. We know we are forced to live with provocation that now is supported by authority of the presidency. The question before us, therefore, is whether four more years of provocation will take the risks to our survival past the point of no return.

The 1984 election will establish a mandate. There will either be a mandate to pursue provocation unimpeded or a mandate to reestablish the safety of America by halting provocation.

The Democratic Party is worth of the mandate we seek from the people of America. Our party is united both in policy and in dedication to act to halt the dangerous provocation of defensive weapons in space.

We are united to halt provocation because our consensus is strong and sure. Our consensus to reverse Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space is part of our larger goal to halt the arms race.

As we seek a mandate to prevent the arms race from spreading to the frontiers of space, we also reaffirm our commitment to a mutual and verifiable freeze on the testing, production, and deployment of nuclear weapons.

Our consensus on reversing Ronald Reagan's commitment to prepare for war in space has been demonstrated in the presidential primary campaign, by vigorous Democratic leadership in the Congress, and by the manifestations of outrage by Democratic voters throughout the nation.

All three Democratic presidential candidates have eloquently and forcefully committed themselves to halt the move toward preparation for war in space.

Democratic leadership in Congress has succeeded in checking the testing of anti-satellite weapons. That leadership is committed to initiatives that would ban all weapons from space.

The key elements of the Democratic Party's consensus in opposing preparations for war in space are: A reaffirmation of the United States' commitment to the 1972 ABM Treaty; A moratorium on testing and deployment of all weapons in space, including anti-satellite weapons, which should then be followed by a mutual and verifiable treaty to ban all weapons from space permanently; and in order to protect America from surprises that might result from the Soviet Union achieving scientific breakthroughs, the United States should maintain ballistic missile defense research consistent with existing arms control agreements.

Twenty years ago when America began the peaceful exploration of space, President John F. Kennedy stated what must remain our nation's commitment to space: ". . . we have vowed that we shall not see (space) governed by a hostile flag of conquest but by a banner of peace and freedom. We have vowed that we shall not see space filled with weapons of mass destruction, but with instruments of knowledge and understanding."

With that legacy to guide us, we shall not fail.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, June 28, 1984.

CHARLES T. MANATT,
Chairman, Democratic National Committee, Massachusetts Avenue NW., Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN MANATT: Thank you for your strong and courageous statement repudiating President Reagan's "star wars" proposal. We, too, share your deep concern over the prospects of a dangerous and uncontrollable arms race in space. Such a race will add nothing to United States security interests and only serve to undermine current and future arms control agreements. Beyond this, the costs of space weapons will be fabulously expensive. Clearly, this issue should be prominent on the Democratic agenda in 1984.

Again, we want to commend you for your leadership and we look forward to working with you and the Democratic nominee on this issue in the future.

"STAR WARS": A THREAT TO THE ABM TREATY

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an article which appeared recently in the Washington Post entitled, "U.S. Close to Violating ABM Treaty, Panel of Security Specialists Says." A group of experts are warning that development of the President's Strategic Defense Initiative would seriously jeopardize the ABM treaty. This treaty, one which has been so successful in stopping at least a part of the arms race, should be preserved intact. As elected representatives, we must consider the very real and serious consequences that would materialize without it. We should not be entertaining the prospect of undermining this arms control achievement. I hope that my colleagues will take a moment to reflect on the direction that we here in the Congress should be taking to build on the few real gains we have made.

[From the Washington Post, June 20, 1984]

UNITED STATES CLOSE TO VIOLATING ABM TREATY, PANEL OF SECURITY SPECIALISTS SAYS

By pushing development of its "Star Wars" missile defense system, the Reagan administration is close to a clear U.S. violation of the 1972 anti-ballistic missile (ABM) treaty, a panel of security and arms control specialists said yesterday.

The panel is beginning what it calls a "national campaign to save the ABM treaty" by attempting to persuade Congress to refuse to provide funds for the new defensive system that would be partly based in space.

The campaign's 46 sponsors include former President Carter, former secretary of state Dean Rusk, former defense secretary Robert S. McNamara, retired Army Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor and former CIA directors Stansfield Turner and William E. Colby.

If the new strategic defensive system is deployed, it will intensify the nuclear arms race with the Soviet Union and lead to decades of nuclear instability, the group contends.

Signed by President Richard M. Nixon and the late Soviet President Leonid I. Brezhnev, the 1972 ABM treaty bans all space-based ABM systems or any nationwide defense against missile attack. The theory is that the best preventive against nuclear war is the knowledge that it would be mutually destructive.

The treaty's supporters say its ratification paved the way for all subsequent negotiations armed at reducing U.S. and Soviet nuclear arsenals.

Gerard C. Smith, the chief U.S. arms negotiator at the time the ABM treaty was signed, said at a news conference at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace that he believes—as he did in 1972—that the deployment of an effective, nationwide ABM system by one superpower would produce irresistible pressure on the other to deploy enough missiles to penetrate it.

That would lead to a tremendously increased arms race that would destroy arms control efforts, Smith said. "It seems to me we are on a slippery slope," he said. "We are already in an anticipatory breach of contract."

Smith, a former director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, said the group leading the new campaign favors continuing research on advanced ABM systems as a hedge against a possible Soviet "breakout" from the terms of the 1972 accord.

"What we are objecting to is an American breakout," by the actual development and deployment of a space-based ABM system, he said.●

TRIBUTE TO RUSS PURCHASE

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today before this distinguished body to pay special tribute to Russ Purchase, president of Air-Flite and Serv-a-Plane at Tri-City Airport in Freeland, MI. I want to take this opportunity to honor Russ for his lifelong dedication to aviation.

Russ was born on September 1912 in Freeland on a farm which later became part of Tri-City Airport. When Russ was 13 years old he began his love affair with the airplane after winning a spelling bee with the prize being a ride in an OX5 Jenny. After this first experience, Russ became fascinated with aviation and was determined to become a pilot.

By 21, he had learned to fly and soloed in an OX5 Swallow. Two years after his first flying lesson, which cost only $6 an hour at Saginaw's Janes Airport, Russ acquired his own plane and took to the skies in a Swallow biplane. He continued to buy an assortment of aircraft, and at one time owned a fleet of eight airplanes at Janes Airport.

In 1940, Russ opened a flight school and later conducted programs under the CPT and WTS programs. Not long after this, Russ was appointed a pilot examiner for the Federal Aviation Administration.

During the World War II era, Russ served his country by joining the Air Transport Command, 3d Ferrying Group at Romulus, MI, as a civilian. Six months later he was commissioned as a first lieutenant.

Shortly after completing his tour of military duty, which took him across the Atlantic, Russ began work with Dow Chemical Co. and traveled to Houston. There he flew as a copilot on DC-3's for 2 years. His work then took him to Tulsa where he acted as chief pilot and also set up a flight department. Russ was then transferred to the Midland, MI, headquarters of Dow, where he also served as head pilot and established a flight department.

In 1983, Russ, opened up his own business, Air-Flite, but continued his work for both Dow Corning and Dow Chemical on a contract basis. Eventually, he sold Air-Flite to Aero Services, Tri-City, Inc.

From 1934 to the present, Russ has logged roughly 27,000 hours in the air. In those 50 years of productive, rewarding and faithful service to the community, the traveling public, and his country, Russ has seen the growth of the aviation business. He can be proud of the contribution he has made to the development of this industry. It is my great honor to wish Russ, his wife and three children, the very best in the future.●

FEDERAL CREDIT UNION WEEK

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago the Congress adopted the Federal Credit Union Act to provide for the establishment of Federal Credit Unions throughout the Nation to serve the needs of small savers and advance the principle of thrift. To commemorate that auspicious occasion and to acknowledge the outstanding service credit unions have provided their membership, the Congress passed House Joint Resolution 139 earlier this year to establish Federal Credit Union Week. In honor of the 50th anniversary of the signing of the Federal Credit Union Act and in accordance with the provisions of House Joint Resolution 139, President Reagan has proclaimed the week of June 24-30 Federal Credit Union Week.

Earlier this week, the National Credit Union Administration—the regulatory agency for credit unions—honored two of our colleagues, Representative BILL PATMAN and Representative CONNIE MACK for the significant contribution of their father and grandfather respectively, in the creation and development of our Federal Credit Union System.

Mr. Speaker, without objection, I ask that the text of House Joint Resolution 139 as well as the Presidential proclamation designating the week of June 24-30, as Federal Credit Union Week be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

JOINT RESOLUTION TO DESIGNATE THE WEEK BEGINNING JUNE 24, 1984, AS "FEDERAL CREDIT UNION WEEK"

Whereas on June 26, 1934, President Franklin Roosevelt signed into law the Federal Credit Union Act;

Whereas the enactment of the Federal Credit Union Act enabled credit unions to be organized throughout the United States under charters approved by the Federal Government;

Whereas Federal credit unions are cooperative associations organized in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Credit Union Act for the purpose of promoting thrift among their members and creating a source of credit for provident or productive purposes;

Whereas Federal credit unions have consistently reflected the cooperative spirit of people helping people and the philosophical tradition that gave birth to the Federal Credit Union Act; and

Whereas June 26, 1984, is the fiftieth anniversary of the date of the enactment of the Federal Credit Union Act: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning June 24, 1984, hereby is designated "Federal Credit Union Week", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

A PROCLAMATION—FEDERAL CREDIT UNION WEEK, 1984

This year marks the fiftieth anniversary of the passage of the Federal Credit Union Act of 1934 which enabled credit unions to be organized throughout the United States under charters approved by the Federal government.

Credit unions are uniquely democratic economic organizations, founded on the principle that persons of good character and modest means, joining together in cooperative spirit and action, can promote thrift, create a source of credit for productive purposes, and build a better standard of living for themselves. Because credit unions exemplify the traditional American values of thrift, self-help and voluntarism, they have carved a special place for themselves among the Nation's financial institutions.

Today, Federal credit unions are at their strongest point in history. They enter this, their 50th anniversary year, as the Nation's fastest-growing financial institutions. As member-owned cooperatives, credit unions operate with the credo, "Not for profit, not for charity—but for service." Credit unions have maintained allegiance to this ideal and as a result have consistently reflected the philosophical tradition and the cooperative spirit of people helping people that prompted passage of the Federal Credit Union Act.

The Congress, by House Joint Resolution 139, has designated the week beginning June 24, 1984 as "Federal Credit Union Week" and has authorized and requested the President to issue a proclamation calling for the observance of this occasion.

Now, Therefore, I, Ronald Reagan, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the week beginning June 24, 1984, as Federal Credit Union Week. I call upon the people of the United States to celebrate this week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this eighteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-four, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and eighth.

RONALD REAGAN.●

TREASURY-POSTAL SERVICE APPROPRIATIONS BILL

HON. CECIL (CEC) HEFTEL

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. HEFTEL. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, June 27, I voted against an amendment to the Treasury-Postal Service appropriations bill that would have struck language that prohibits the use of Federal health plan benefits to pay for abortions.

I opposed this amendment because I do not believe that appropriations bill should be used as vehicles for substantive, legislative changes. Nevertheless, I remain firmly committed to prochoice and to Federal assistance to pay for abortions for those who cannot otherwise afford to have one. Not to offer Federal assistance for abortions is discriminatory and can force women into pursuing unsafe alternatives. I will continue to support legislation that assures safe and legal abortions for all.●

"STAR WARS" AND THE ABM TREATY

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, the administration's "Star Wars" ballistic missile defense program has serious implications for American security and for existing arms control agreements. It threatens to undermine the stability of the nuclear balance, impose tremendous costs on the American taxpayers, and lead to the abrogation of the ABM Treaty. Further, the entire "Star Wars" program rests on the dangerous illusion that it is possible to survive a nuclear war.

In connection with the National Campaign to Save the ABM Treaty, two important studies have been made relating to the "Star Wars" program and its implications for the ABM Treaty. I commend these studies to the attention of my colleagues, and ask that the executive summary and introduction of a report by Thomas K. Longstreth and John E. Pike and the summary of a brief by Alan Sherr for the Lawyers Alliance for Nuclear Arms Control be printed in the RECORD.

A REPORT ON THE IMPACT OF UNITED STATES AND SOVIET BALLISTIC MISSILE DEFENSE PROGRAMS ON THE ABM TREATY

(Prepared by Thomas K. Longstreth and John E. Pike)

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The Reagan Administration has launched a major program aimed at establishing defenses against the threat of nuclear attack. The Strategic Defense Initiative, as it is known, offers a superficially appealing solution to the nuclear dilemma, but it in fact, threatens to spur the arms race forward, destroy existing arms agreements and eliminate any chance for future arms control.

The Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty of 1972 bans nationwide systems that defend against ballistic missile attack. For over a decade, the ABM Treaty has enhanced our national security by preventing a costly and dangerous arms race in antimissile weapons. Abandoning its prohibitions on large ABM systems would eliminate any possibility of significant limits on offensive nuclear forces.

Present and future U.S. and Soviet defense systems threaten the continued viability of the ABM Treaty. The development and testing of ABM components could violate the ABM Treaty well before the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. decide whether to initiate deployment of space-based missile defense systems.

The U.S. and the U.S.S.R. probably will not take the provocative step of formally abrogating the ABM Treaty. Each could choose simply to undertake activities that undermine the agreement, steadily eroding its restrictions until the Treaty has lost its significance.

Decision-makers in the executive and legislative branches appear to be largely unaware of, or indifferent to, the threat to the ABM Treaty, other agreements, and further arms control measures posed by present and planned U.S. and Soviet missile defense programs.

This report, based on unclassified sources, provides a comprehensive analysis of U.S. and Soviet missile defense programs and their impact on the ABM Treaty. A private study, however, is no substitute for a thorough and authoritative review of the situation by U.S. Government agencies charged with evaluating the effect of miltiary programs on existing arms agreements and U.S. national security.

The U.S. and the U.S.S.R. have failed to make a serious, joint effort to preserve the ABM Treaty. Instead, each has defended its programs' conformity to the Treaty and disregarded the need for clarification of Treaty language so as to prevent exploitation of ambiguities and loopholes. The U.S. and the U.S.S.R. must reach Common Understandings or Agreed Statements regarding certain ABM Treaty terms and definitions if the Treaty is to remain viable.

The U.S. and the U.S.S.R. must also reach agreement on limiting devices or systems that, although ostensibly designed for other purposes, could be used in an ABM role. Chief among these are large phased-array radars, anti-tactical missiles, and anti-satellite systems. For example, negotiations toward an ASAT agreement are needed to prevent further development, testing, and deployment of ASAT systems that will seriously undermine the ABM Treaty.

INTRODUCTION

On March 23, 1983, President Reagan gave what is now popularly known as his "Star Wars" speech calling on the nation's scientists and engineers to pursue technologies that would make the United States safe from the threat of nuclear annihilation. He also directed the development of an intensive effort to begin a "research and development program aimed at an ultimate goal of eliminating the threat posed by nuclear ballistic missiles."

Since his speech, the President has signed a number of directives aimed at reprogramming previous U.S. missile defense efforts and placing them within his Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), as the Reagan Administration now calls the Star Wars plan. Although both the United States and the Soviet Union have long had active research and development programs to examine ballistic missile defense (BMD), the U.S. effort has been restructured and additional concepts are being examined at the President's direction. The SDI's main focus will be to develop and possibly test and build a system designed to intercept and destroy ballistic missiles in various stages of flight.

Well before the U.S. must make a decision whether to deploy a space-based missile defense system, the development and testing of such a system and its components would violate the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty, generally regarded as the cornerstone of the present arms control regime.

This report evaluates the premise and outlines the basic provisions of the ABM Treaty. It provides a preliminary analysis of the impact of the President's Strategic Defense Initiative on the ABM Treaty, addresses threats to the Treaty represented by present and future U.S. and Soviet programs, and proposes a number of steps that must be taken if the Treaty is to be preserved.

The study was undertaken because of its authors' concern that decision-makers in the executive and legislative branches, as well as the general public, are unaware of the near-term implications of U.S. and Soviet missile defense programs for the future of arms control. Unfortunately, official mechanisms for reviewing such implications, particularly the "Arms Control Impact Statements" submitted to the Congress by the President each year, have been inadequate in presenting the problems.●

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM R. PERL

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, William R. Perl, a senior citizen and noted humanitarian, was recently honored by the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles where he gave a speech which I feel exemplifies human courage in the face of racism, oppression, and diversity. I am requesting that his statement be included in the RECORD for the benefit of all:

TALK ON YOM HASHOA (HOLOCAUST MEMORIAL DAY) APRIL 29, 1984, AT SIMON WIESENTHAL CENTER

(By William R. Perl)

I am sometimes referred to as a survivor and so is my wife. But I believe that there are no real survivors of the Holocaust. Anyone who experienced any facet of that unimaginable horror can have survived partially only. One who saw the mother, father, brother, or friend murdered or knew one's beloved shipped in cattle cars not to be just killed but to be "exterminated" like vermin is bound to remain captive in the grip of such experience. There is hardly a week when my wife or I do not awaken each other by a scream or a whimper signaling another nightmare.

In a few days it will be 39 years since Nazi Germany collapsed, yet the real dynamics of the Holocaust remain widely misunderstood.

I am often asked: "How did you get out?" and it is this very question that shows the abyss of misunderstanding regarding what made the Holocaust possible. The fact is that up to the almost final stages the problem was far less of how to get out than how to get into another country.

The guilt of the Nazis is irreducible. They developed the idea; they put it into action; they were the executioners. But to view them as the sole responsible ones is an oversimplification which has lived in the minds of too many too long. The so-called free countries closed their doors to those who tried to escape or admitted nominal numbers only. The Nazis set the house afire, and the nations of the world locked the doors of escape.

It has been described in detail how Britain abused the power vested into her by the League of Nations that accepted Britain's promise of the Balfour declaration and made its statement, (Britain's obligation to aid in the establishment of a Jewish Homeland in Palestine) the preamble of the Mandate with which the League of Nations entrusted the British.

But when we look at the other nations, we find a related pattern of brutally sabotaging rescue efforts. Though my entire presentation lasts 16 minutes only, I have to provide a few figures to substantiate my accusation that the nations of the world must share in the guilt of having made the Holocaust possible. Let us look at our own door first.

During the entire 12 years of the Hitler era, American immigration remained ruled by an antiquated quota system dating back to 1920. Visas were assigned according to the ethnic destribution in 1920, thus reserving huge percentages to natives of Ireland, Britain, and Russia, although by the time of the Hitler emergency, immigration from Ireland and Russia had come to an almost complete standstill. All Jewish pleas to have these unused visas transfered to the desperate natives of countries in need of them were denied. And worse than that:

From July 1, 1932 to July 1, 1938 only 26% of the available German guota visas were issued, and of those 31% were not given to Jews. And from 1938-1942, when persecution was in full blast, this period including e.g. the Kristallnacht and Babi Yar, less than half of the total of available visas were issued.

Following the huge November 1938 Crystal Night pogroms, Senator Robert Wagner of NY and Representative Edith Rogers of Mass. introduced to the US Senate and House respectively identical bills calling for the admission of 10,000 refugee children under the age of 14 to the US for 1939 and another 10,000 in 1940. The Republicans were opposed, and so were the conservative Southern Democrats. And so was the President, Mr. Roosevelt.

I live in Washington, DC, and we know how often more is decided at diplomatic cocktail parties than in formal meetings. Mr. Pierrepoint Moffat, Chief of the State Department's Division of European Affairs reports in his diary, now in the National Archives, about such a cocktail party that points out more clearly than the official debates the true attitude toward this rescue attempt. Mrs. James Haugheling, wife of the all-powerful Commissioner of Immigration said: The trouble with the Wagner-Rogers bill was "that 20,000 children would all too soon grow up into 20,000 ugly adults." Well, the law never left the committees, and the 20,000 children did not grow into any kind of adults.

Another example of how these cruel statistics worked on the individual level is the one of the SS Saint Louis, of the Voyage of the Damned. Shortly before the outbreak of the war, in the 7th year of Nazi persecution, 907 mostly German Jews obtained visas to Cuba. When their ship arrived in Havana, the Cuban government had changed its mind. Desperate pleas for rescuing admission went to several countries in the Americas. All of them, including the US, refused. Rabbi Steven Wise, accompanied by other Jewish leaders, met with Mr. Roosevelt and pleaded to admit the 907 ex quota. Denied. He asked to utilize the British or Russian quota. Denied. He asked to mortgage the German quota for future years. Denied. So Rabbi Wise and his entourage went home. And the 907 escapees went home too—to Europe. The ships captain delayed the return by sailing along the Florida Coast. His ship, a German liner flying the Nazi flag, was shadowed by a US gun boat to make certain that nobody tried to save himself by trying to swim to the free shores. And life on Collins Avenue went on as usual as the 907 sailed back to Europe, most of them to their deaths.

Canada behaved even worse that its large American neighbor. The infamous answer of a key Canadian immigration official to the question how many admissions he would think acceptable, became the title of a recent book. The answer was "None is too many."

The story repeats itself with variations in Canberra, Buenos Aires, all over.

And let nobody claim that the respective governments did not know exact details of the persecution from the day Hitler came to pawer. Particularly the British and the American governments had first hand intelligence on the Jewish condition. The horrors of the Kristallnacht were even widely reported in the press and on radio, and as the persecution increased, incoming reports grew more numerous, more detailed—and more gruesome.

Almost three years before the collapse of the Nazi regime and the end of the war of extermination, on June 25, 1942, London's Daily Telegraph reported: "More than 700,000 Polish Jews have been slaughtered by the Germans in the greatest massacres in the world's history." A second report in the same paper states on June 30 1942: "More than 1,000,000 Jews killed in Europe." That report contains details of the ongoing slaughter, including the use of poison gas.

The New York Times picked up the Daily Telegraph reports and published them, somewhere in the middle of the paper on June 30th and July 2nd.

These are just some of the published reports. Whoever wants to know more about the exact knowledge of the allied and other governments might want to read Walter Laqueur's well researched book, "The Terrible Secret."

The statement I am going to make is quite strong, but it is based on facts which we so far refused to face clearly. In making it I am, of course, not speaking for the Wiesenthal Center, but I do speak on behalf of historical facts and in the name of those whom we are commemorating today, those who could have been saved but found the saving doors barred.

History shows that the Holocaust was not committed in Berlin and in Auschwitz only, and in Treblinka, Maydenek and the other places of slaughter but also in London, Washington, Rio, Ottawa, Pretoria and the other capitals that refused to admit those trying to escape the massacres.

It is a truth hard to swallow, but the Nazis operated the factories of death and, by their policies, the nations of the world made certain that there were ample supplies.

Only if we have the courage to face even most repugnant facts, can we avoid falling victim to the principle that those who do not learn from history are condemned to re-experience it.

Today's situation of the Jewish people shows frightening similarities with the antecedents of the Holocaust. Again a substantial percentage of the Jewish people, three and a quarter million, is openly, even challengingly threatened with annihilation. Again the nations of the world, when dealing with the countries which openly proclaim this annihilation threat, choose, for reasons of expedience, not to acknowledge it. And again, too many Jewish groups minimize its deadly seriousness.

Almost unnoticed in its meaning, the psychological preparation required for the unimaginable brutality of such mass murder has been set into motion. Barbarity against humans, the Nazis had recognized, is best achieved by first delegalizing and dehumanizing the victims, an old principle. The American slave holder could pray with full devotion in the morning, yet in the afternoon buy, sell or otherwise mistreat slaves—they were outside the law. The Nuremberg laws and the media painting the Jews as depraved, vicious, and satanic preceded the mass brutalities. Systematically, the propaganda of the avowed mideastern annihilators tries to delegitimize Israel and to dehumanize its citizens. Ousting of Israel from this or that organization, persistent refusal to acknowledge even her existence, slaughter of its diplomats, athletes, and just plain citizens goes together with fabricated claims of Israeli inhuman behavior.

In deviously slanted information, sometimes by blunt disinformation, Israelis are painted as villains, as inhuman aggressors and ruthless oppressors, thus setting the stage for the announced plan of annihilation, at which at least apathy should be expected, maybe even some feeling that the Jews are just getting what by their evil behavior they had asked for.

Certainly many of those who write or send such distorted reports are not consciously working up towards another genocide; they simply follow the pro-Arab line of their paper or station. But it is our duty to point out to them what kind of game and whose game they are playing.

We also have to tear the mask off the faces of those who try to convince the public that some of those who have sworn to destroy Israel are "moderates." Who was more moderate: Hitler or Eichmann? Dr. Mengele or Borman? And who is more moderate: Arafat or the rulers of Saudi Arabia who, as almost a matter of routine, proclaim the existence of Jihad, the Muslim holy war with one aim only: the total elimination of Israel. They also have been bankrolling the PLO for decades and are still financing them to spread terror in Israel and against Jews outside of it. And how moderate is King Hussein who in 1967, when every inch of what he now calls the West Bank had been under his rule for 19 years, though Israel pleaded for peace with him, invaded Israel and who still refuses to accept even its existence, bound as ever on its destruction.

It is not a popular task those are facing who have the courage to stand up and to say: So many of the previous generation kept quiet while every day from sunrise to sunrise alone in Auschwitz 8,000 of their brothers and sisters were marched into the gas chambers. Let us vow as follows: I shall not keep silent. I shall keep faith with the martyred ones who are honored here today. Through my organization devoted to that purpose but also by utilizing all my personal connections and possibilities, I vow to do my utmost to expose the pattern that is being employed for yet another bloodbath, one that if it did, God forbid, succeed, would make the cruelties of the Hitler era pale, I promise to myself, to the victims of the Holocaust to my children—in fact to mankind that I will do everything in my power to make certain that anything near to what happened to Europe's Jews between 1933 and 1945 will happen never, ever again.●

40TH ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY

HON. CHALMERS P. WYLIE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, one of the most memorable experiences I ever had occurred on June 6 of this year. I was a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee delegation to Normandy for the 40th D-day anniversary.

Chairman G. V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY, my good friend the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee organized the trip. He put together an excellent agenda which captured the highlights of that never-to-be-forgotten day 40 years ago.

May I say a heartfelt thanks to a truly illustrious gentleman and bring to the attention of our colleagues an informative account of the events we participated in during our visit to Normandy.

40TH ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY

(By G.V. (Sonny) Montgomery)

INTRODUCTION

During the period June 2-6, 1984, I headed a delegation of 18 Members to visit Normandy, France. It was on June 6, 1944, that the battle of Normandy began. It is generally agreed that D-Day 1944 was the most historic battle of World War II and the most massive invasion in military history. Accordingly, the primary purpose of the visit was to represent the U.S. House of Representatives at the various 40th Anniversary ceremonies, and to tour the battlefields and monuments in the Normandy area, where the course of history was changed by the successful invasion on D-Day. I would note that the cemeteries and monuments in the Normandy area come under the jurisdiction of the Veterans Affairs Committee.

The visit also provided the opportunity to meet with officials who administer a memorial owned by the United States Government and dedicated to the memory of General John J. Pershing, Chief of Staff of U.S. Forces during World War I. Called the Pershing Memorial, it is located in Paris, France.

BACKGROUND

More than 16 million Americans served in the Armed Forces of the United States during World War II. There were many battles fought during that war all over the world in defense of freedom. The most crucial battle occurred on June 6, 1944, at Normandy, France, when American and allied forces joined together to regain a foothold in Europe. There were over 153,000 troops, 5,000 naval vessels and 11,000 sorties of allied aircraft in this battle. Included in the assault troops were three divisions of airborne troops, the 82nd and 101st of the United States and the 6th of Britain. The skies were literally dotted with planes and the sea filled with ships, which were transporting allied troops to land against a strongly fortified coast. In a very short period, the allies had driven from the air, the once-vaunted Luftwaffe, and the German navy from the sea. As the allied troops moved inland after that first day, the flame of hope was rekindled for freedom-loving people all over the world.

In this regard, resolutions were introduced in the House to designate June 6, 1984 as D-Day National Remembrance Day. H.J. Res. 487, introduced by the Honorable Tom Lantos, a member of the delegation, was signed by the President on May 31, 1984 as Public Law 98-311, which designated June 6, 1984 as D-Day National Remembrance Day.

ITINERARY

The delegation represented the U.S. House of Representatives at the observances of D-Day. The delegation visited the battlefields of Normandy, including U.S. landing sites of the battles that occurred on June 6, 1944. A number of Members of the group participated in the invasion or were active in the European Theater during World War II, while others served in battles in the Pacific Theater. The week's events culminated on June 6th with a memorial service at the U.S. Cemetery at Normandy at which President Reagan spoke and was accompanied by the President of France, Francois Mitterrand. Members of the delegation were guests of honor at this ceremony which was televised by the three major U.S. networks, as well as networks in allied countries.

SCOPE OF REPORT

This report is not intended to serve as an official statement regarding the events that occurred during the 40th anniversary of the commemoration of D-Day. The delegation visited a number of U.S. Facilities, the majority of which are under the administration of the American Battle Monuments Commission. In this regard, the delegation had the opportunity to evaluate the organization and its administration of these memorials, and to evaluate the effectiveness of the administration and execution of this entity of our Government having responsibilities established and funded by Congress.

CHRONOLOGY

Sunday, June 3, 1984

Our host for the day was Brigadier General John W. Donaldson, European Office, American Battle Monuments Commission, who provided the delegation with a tour of the Normandy area. We stopped at a number of historic sites, including Omaha Beach, Pointe Du Hoc, Vierville, the U.S. Cemetery, and Bayeux.

There were still many reminders of the war years in this area, especially along the coast where gun emplacements and bunkers still stand. General Donaldson was an excellent guide and provided a detailed description which helped make it possible to visualize the enormous sacrifice made by U.S. troops when they stormed ashore on Omaha Beach on D-Day.

Although it was not a major undertaking in the terms of numbers of soldiers and equipment involved, Pointe Du Hoc serves as the best example of courage under fire. It was Pointe Du Hoc, with German guns situated thereon, which became a symbol of American heroism. A 100 foot cliff, vertical, almost straight up, was captured by a U.S. Ranger Battalion, led by Col. James Rudder. The Rangers used rope ladders and hook ladders borrowed from fire fighters in Britain to climb this cliff. Despite the heaviest of losses, the Rangers took possession of the cliff on schedule.

Close by Omaha Beach is the National Guard Monument at Vierville-sur-mer. The National Guard Monument at Normandy was created and built by members of the Army and Air National Guard to commemorate the heroism of the U.S. Forces which landed on D-Day, June 6, 1944, to launch the liberation of France and, indeed, western Europe. The monument is maintained through the historical Society of the Militia and National Guard. This year marks the 15th anniversary of the monument. It was dedicated on June 6, 1969 and is situated atop a battered pillbox overlooking Omaha Beach in the landing area of the 116th Infantry Regiment, the lead element of the 29th (Blue and Gray) Infantry Division on that fateful morning some 40 years ago.

Not far from Omaha Beach is the Normandy American Cemetery and Memorial. There are 9,386 war dead buried here, with 307 of the headstones marked "unknown". The most famous Americans buried here are President Theodore Roosevelt's sons, Quentin and Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., who lie side-by-side. In 33 instances, two brothers lie side-by-side. In another instance, a father and son lie side-by-side. Almost all lost their lives in the landing operation.

The memorial is a moving tribute to those who made the supreme sacrifice. A 22 foot bronze statue is located on the platform of the memorial—"The Spirit of American Youth" rising out of the waves has captured this feeling for all time. The cemetery is well cared for, and a monument all Americans can be proud of.

On the east side of the memorial is a semicircular Garden of the Missing. There are 1,557 names inscribed on the wall of this lovely and beautiful landscaped garden of those who gave their lives in this region, but whose remains have not been recovered, or if recovered, not identified. The names are in alphabetical order and represent every state in the union and the District of Columbia. A few came from England, Canada, and Scotland.

By way of contrast, the delegation visited two additional cemeteries later in the day. The first was the German Cemetery in La Combe. Here we were told there are over 21,000 German soldiers buried. There was a somber atmosphere to this cemetery, with its sad dark beauty and black granite crosses, when contrasted with the gleaming Latin white crosses and Stars of David in the U.S. Cemetery. Later, the delegation viewed the British Cemetery, located in Bayeux. Here the British have interred their fallen heroes in a setting more like the U.S. Cemetery. Instead of crosses, the British have erected upright stones similar to those in Arlington National Cemetery and other U.S. National Cemeteries, with flowers and shrubs on either side of the stones.

Throughout the tour, the delegation was privileged to have the benefit of the personal experiences of three of the Members who had landed in Normandy on D-Day. They were the Honorable Sam Gibbons, Robert A. Young, and former Member Teno Roncalio of Wyoming. All three recounted in detail their experiences during this crucial period, and gave a perspective to the tour which could not be matched.

The tour took the delegation through the countryside with its hedgerows which we were told have not changed. We stopped in Bayeux, the first town to be liberated in 1944. Here there is a museum devoted to the history of the Battle of Normandy and a monument commemorating Bayeux' return to freedom.

The people of Normandy were most hospitable, courteous and supportive throughout the tour. They obviously like Americans and are still deeply appreciative for their liberation from the Germans.

Monday, June 4, 1984

As indicated previously, a number of Members of the delegation participated in battles in the European Theater during World War II. Some of the fiercest battles were fought in Northern France and in the Ardennes Campaign. Some Members of the delegation flew to Luxembourg to visit the U.S. Cemetery in Luxembourg, where more than 5,000 American soldiers are buried. The most famous person buried here is General George S. Patton, Jr., Commander, U.S. Third Army. Most of those buried in this cemetery gave their lives in the so-called Battle of the Bulge during the Ardennes Campaign, which stopped the German counter-attack in December, 1944. We were provided a tour of the cemetery by the Superintendent, Mr. Even Hubai, and his Assistant, Donny Sykes. The cemetery is well cared for, in excellent condition and because it includes the remains of General Patton, it is visited by more Americans than other U.S. Cemetery in Europe. Accordingly, the grave of General Patton is situated to provide easy access to visitors.

We visited the battlefield in Herrlisheim, near Colmar and we were warmly greeted by Mayor Buschek of Herrlisheim and other officials.

In the afternoon, I visited, together with officials of the U.S. Embassy, American Battle Monuments Commission, and staff, the Pershing Memorial located in Paris. The memorial is a building which is owned by the U.S. Government. It honors General John J. Pershing, Commander, U.S. Troops, World War I, and all who served with him. The individuals in charge of operating the memorial for the U.S. Government, the Pershing Hall operating committee, provided a tour of the building and a briefing of their activities. The management of this building is presently under review. Therefore several proposals were presented by individuals representing different groups regarding the permanent management of this memorial. The Committee will be considering these proposals which were presented by the principals involved in operating the memorial, as well as other options before the Committee regarding this memorial.

Tuesday, June 5, 1984

In the morning, the delegation toured Utah Beach. Again, our host and narrator was General Donaldson, who provided us with a vivid account of the landings on Utah Beach on D-Day, through which were to pour thousands of American troops, material, and equipment. Utah Beach is situated west of Omaha Beach and, unlike Omaha Beach, those who landed here were faced with a sea wall rather than hills to climb or cliffs to scale. Utah Beach provided access to the roads to the north and west, making the area a key to later operations as our forces moved inland to encircle and cut off the German forces. It was the VII Corps of the U.S. Army which was assigned the task of seizing and holding the area behind Utah Beach as part of the goal of capturing Cherbourg as soon as possible. There is a Utah Beach monument which commemorates the achievments and sacrifices of the American forces of the VII Corps who participated in the landing and liberation of the peninsula from June 6 to July 16, 1944. Also located around the site of the Utah Beach monument stands a liberty way milestone and a monument to the U.S. 4th Division. Here also is an impressive monument to the Americans of the 1st Engineer Special Brigade, which is a former German blockhouse. On the north side of the esplanade, in front of the Engineer Monument, is a small stake honoring the men of the 90th Division.

Two of the nearest towns to Utah Beach are Carentan and St. Mere Eglise, both on the main road from Cherbourg to Paris. St. Mere Eglise is the town upon which American paratroopers landed on June 6th, with many landing on the area adjacent to the church. In order to dislodge the Germans in the church tower, the Americans machinegunned the interior of the church. We were told that traces are still visible near the pulpit and on some of the arches of the nave. Since there were so many visitors in this small town, the doors to the church were locked. However, we could view the stained-glass window over the portal which shows the historic landing of the American paratroopers during the night before the D-Day landings. This is the only church in France having a stained-glass window offered by a foreign active military unit—the 82nd Airforce Division at Ft. Bragg, North Carolina. At the top and center of the window is the badge of the paratroopers, with the lower center, that of glider troops surrounded by Faith, Hope and Charity. On the left side of the glass is the divisional patch of the 82nd Division—A.A. which stands for All American.

The other airborne division to land behind the fortified German lines in this area was the 101st Airborne, of which Mr. Gibbons was a member. Its mission was to take Carentan and control the coastal area as far as Poupeyville, a town we also passed through. The delegation was provided many human interest stories of the pain and suffering, as well as some infrequent lighter moments endured by our troops, with individual Normandy homes being identified that were used by American forces during that period.

In the afternoon, the delegation returned to Pointe Du Hoc for a number of ceremonies. A battle-scarred Pointe Du Hoc remains today exactly as the Rangers left it in June of 1944. The only addition is a large stone monument erected in memorial tribute to the men who fought and died there, by a dedicated grateful group of Frenchmen. Pointe Du Hoc has been given in perpetuity to the United States, and is administered by the American Battle Monuments Commission. On this day, there was a reenactment of the climb up the cliff by soldiers of the 10th Special Forces of the U.S. Army. General Eisenhower, who also visited this point following World War II, summed it up when he said: "it took guts to get up that cliff that day". Following the reenactment, a ceremony was held by the French to present a plaque to be placed on the stone monument. There were many Rangers who had participated in the assault on June 6, 1944, who were in attendance, together with members of Ranger battalions on active duty in the Armed Forces. The leader of the Rangers on June 6, 1944, Col. James Rudder, died a few years ago, but his widow occupied a seat of honor at this ceremony.

The delegation witnessed a parachute jump by 150 paratroopers of the 82nd Airborne Division and 30 paratroopers from a British Unit. This event was attended by many of the dignitaries who had led the attack on D-Day, including General J. Lawton Collins, U.S. Army, retired; and General James Van Fleet, U.S. Army, retired, who led an attack force. The paratroopers provided the delegation with a reenactment jump which was not only spectacular, but demonstrated the capability that today's paratroopers land where they are supposed to, notwithstanding the prevailing winds and other obstacles they may encounter. (A large number of paratroopers missed their landing targets in 1944 by considerable margins).

Wednesday, June 6, 1984

The highlight of the trip occurred at the U.S. Cemetery in Normandy on this date. President Reagan, accompanied by President Mitterand of France, delivered a short, stirring address commemorating the sacrifice made by American soldiers on June 6, 1944. Major American television networks and European networks recorded the event, which made it possible for millions to share in this glorious occasion.

The delegation arrived early for the Presidential memorial service. This provided an opportunity to meet with commanders of all the major national veterans organizations or their representatives who were present for the ceremony. In addition, the delegation visited with hundreds of American veterans and servicemen who came to Normandy for this ceremony.

The spirit and meaning of this 40th anniversary was captured by the President when he stated in his remarks: "Mr. President, distinguished guests, we stand today at a place of battle, one that 40 years ago saw and felt the worst of war. Men bled and died here for a few feet of or inches of sand as bullets and shellfire cut through their ranks. About them, General Omar Bradley later said, "Every man who set foot on Omaha Beach that day was a hero."

No speech can adequately portray their suffering, their sacrifice, their heroism. President Lincoln once reminded us that through their deeds, the dead of battle have spoken more eloquently for themselves than any of the living ever could. But we can only honor them by rededicating ourselves to the cause for which they gave a last full measure of devotion.

Today, we do rededicate ourselves to that cause. And, at this place of honor, we are humbled by the realization of how much so many gave to the cause of freedom and to their fellow man.●

NOT ALL CRIMINAL OFFENDERS LOSE THEIR RIGHT TO VOTE

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, the right of qualified persons to register and vote is of fundamental importance to our American system of government. However, for a certain population of criminal offenders, that right is very often ignored because of the erroneous belief that everyone who goes to jail is disenfranchised. Ordinarily, it is only convicted felons that lose their voting rights under State law. Those persons convicted of misdemeanors, or who are pretrial detainees, or are appealing a felony conviction usually remain eligible to register and vote, but rarely do they exercise their voting rights because both they and corrections officials are unaware of what the law provides.

It is estimated that there are approximately 300,000 men and women in custody that do not know that they retain the right to vote. This to me is an intolerable condition which all of us should begin working within our own congressional districts to address. To assist in such efforts, I am today introducing a House Concurrent Resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that: First, all State constitutions and county and city charters be amended to reflect the right of all pretrial detainees, convicted misdemeanants, and prisoners on appeal to register and vote, second, the opportunity to register and vote be made available to all qualified offenders in our jails and prisons, and third, probation and parole officials consider voting participation to be a positive rehabilitative factor when evaluating the offenders under their supervision.

I invite all of my colleagues to join me as cosponsors of this legislation, the complete text of which is as follows:

H. CON. RES. 335

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring),

Whereas, the population of pretrial detainees, convicted misdemeanants and persons appealing their convictions should have the right to register and vote; and

Whereas, the stated population does not exercise this right because they are generally unaware of their rights and because registration and voting is not usually made available to them; and

Whereas, the denial of the right to vote violates the due process and equal protection of those who have not been found guilty of felonies and those whose convictions are being appealed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) all State constitutions and county and city charters should reflect the right of the stated incarcerated population to register and to vote;

(2) all Federal, State, county, and city registrars of voters provide adequate voter registration accessibility to the stated populations during intake processing (booking), while in the general jail or prison population; and during release, discharge, or transfer;

(3) registrars of voters provide adequate voting accessibility to the stated populations in the form of voting booths and absentee ballots at each and every election henceforward;

(4) respective Federal, State, county and city departments of correction, parole and probation boards accept and encourage the positive rehabilitative value of voter registration and voting; and acceptance of these civic responsibilities be given fair consideration in probation and parole determinations; and

(5) prisoners' rights, community, voter education and political organizations be encouraged to provide voter education and voter advocacy to pretrial detainees, convicted misdemeanants and to persons appealing their convictions.●

RICHARD BENDIX AND THE D-DAY INVASION

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I attended the moving services in Normandy to commemorate the 40th anniversary of D-day—that most ambitious military undertaking in history. I was surprised and delighted when I turned around to meet Richard Emmett Bendix from Redwood City in my congressional district.

Richard was on the beach that momentous June 6 morning and he was now returning—40 years later—with his wife to remember the events of that day. His presence on Omaha Beach brought home to me how much Americans from all over our Nation contributed to the success of this historic invasion.

Richard Bendix joined the U.S. Army in 1943 and upon completion of basic training he volunteered and was accepted into the 5th Ranger Battalion. After extensive Ranger training in the United States and Scotland, he landed with the 5th Rangers in the first assault wave on Omaha Beach on D-day.

The 5th Rangers were the first unit that managed to advance up the heavily defended heights overlooking Omaha Beach and began moving inland. In the afternoon of June 6, while Richard was on patrol in the hedge-rowed fields near the beachhead, he was wounded in the leg by German machine gun fire. Subsequently, he was awarded the Purple Heart.

Richard was discharged from the Army in November 1945, after which he completed high school and went on to receive a business degree from Kinman Business University in Spokane, WA. In 1947 he married Vinnie L. Beck and they are the parents of two fine sons—Patrick Duke and Doak. Currently Richard is the vice president of the Credit Division of Van Waters and Rogers in San Mateo, CA.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to pay tribute here in the House of Representatives to Richard Bendix and to others like him who have contributed so much to preserve and maintain the democracy that we all enjoy.●

OAKWOOD SCHOOL DECLARED NUCLEAR FREE ZONE

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the Oakwood School, located in my congressional district in Poughkeepsie, NY, is the first school in New York and the fifth in the Nation to declare itself a nuclear free zone. While the Oakwood students were here in April, we discussed this matter, and I would like to share the Oakwood School's press release with my colleagues:

OAKWOOD BECOMES NUCLEAR FREE ZONE

Students, faculty and staff at Oakwood School, a Friends boarding and day school in Poughkeepsie, New York, have declared the school a Nuclear Free Zone. A Nuclear Free Zone is a place that has been declared off limits to the design, testing, production, and deployment of nuclear weapons. After five months of education, discussion and debate over the issue, the members of the Quaker school community came to a consensus on Monday, May 7 during an all-school community meeting. Their action makes Oakwood one of five high schools across the nation, the first in New York State, and the first by consensus to declare itself a Nuclear Free Zone. There are 50 nuclear free zones in the U.S. Including towns, high schools and colleges.

Last January, student and faculty members of the school's Disarmament Committee initiated the idea of making Oakwood a Nuclear Free Zone. A pamphlet handed out to the school community stated, "Declaring Oakwood a nuclear free zone might seem like an insignificant step towards changing the world's course to a nuclear holocaust. However, our stand could be an important part of a tremendous and ever-increasing peace movement throughout the world. Establishing a nuclear free Oakwood would offer individuals a unique opportunity to come together as a community in making an effective political and moral statement against nuclear weapons."

Students and faculty raised a number of concerns during the five months of discussion about Nuclear Free Zones. Some felt that it was hypocritical for Oakwood, which has a relatively high standard of living to declare itself a Nuclear Free Zone because much of what the school uses is made by companies that make nuclear weapons. They felt that the use of force and therefore the maintaining of nuclear weapons maintained the high standard of living. Others, however, contended that disarmament is consistent with a high standard of living and that the huge amount of U.S. resources such as money and scientific knowledge could be used for improving the standard of living for the world rather than building weapons for mass destruction that are supposedly built not to be used.

At the request of students and faculty the Disarmament Committee invited people from outside Oakwood to speak on the pros and cons of nuclear free zones. Speaking for NFZ's was Bruce Cronin, an NFZ coordinator from the New York Mobilization for Survival. Debating the other side was Roy Smart from the American Security Council. Smart was not completely against the idea and suggested adding an amendment to the motion that would encourage representatives to vote for building a satellite-based anti-missile laser weapon system. Disarmament Committee members rejected this amendment because they felt billions of dollars would be spent for a system that could be easily deflected; it would lead to an arms race in space; and it would increase, not decrease tensions by making a first strike capability more thinkable if there was a "defense."

Because Smart was not totally against making Oakwood a Nuclear Free Zone, the school invited William Levinson, a chemical engineer who testified against the Nuclear Freeze Resolution in the Dutchess County Legislature, to speak. Levinson felt that declaring Oakwood a Nuclear Free Zone was only a symbolic gesture and therefore was not effective. He also commented that the Soviets do not have the same regard for human life as the U.S. does and would therefore be willing to use nuclear weapons to achieve their goals even if they were to lose 20 million people. Appearing weak would encourage the Soviets to use nuclear weapons, he felt, because arms control is not possible. Therefore, arms buildup is the only way to peace.

Students and faculty challenged Levinson on each point and after his talk a feeling of unity on declaring Oakwood a nuclear free zone arose in the community. The next week the school declared itself a Nuclear Free Zone by consensus of the entire community.

As a Nuclear Free Zone, Oakwood will write to local, state, and federal representatives and ambassadors of all the nations producing nuclear weapons and encourage them to halt and reverse the arms race. The school will contact Hamilton Fish and Senator Moynihan about putting the declaration of a Nuclear Free Zone into the Congressional Record. Members of the Disarmament Committee will also contact other Quaker schools and encourage them to become Nuclear Free Zones.

The school also hopes that the creation of a nuclear free Oakwood will raise the consciousness of people that learn about it and will cause them to question dangerous nuclear policy. It hopes that their action might encourage other schools or towns to declare themselves nuclear free zones.

According to Michael Steinberg, an American History teacher at Oakwood who is advisor to the Disarmament Committee, declaring the school a nuclear free zone is not entirely a symbolic move. "By declaring ourselves an NFZ," he said, "we insure that the campus will not be used by any companies or the government to design, test, produce or deploy nuclear weapons. Though Oakwood is an unlikely candidate for any of these activities, educational institutions—mostly colleges—have been and continue to be the home of almost all nuclear weapons research. Without question our act will add to the momentum of the peace movement that hopefully will be successful in stopping and reversing the arms race."●

VOTING RIGHTS OF MILITARY AND OVERSEAS CITIZENS

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a matter of serious concern regarding the right to vote for U.S. citizens overseas. This matter was brought to my attention by a constituent, Mr. Sam Wright of Arlington, VA, an attorney who also serves as lieutenant commander in the Navy Reserve. Mr. Wright has done extensive work to enable overseas personnel the opportunity to vote.

According to a Department of Defense survey, approximately 182,000 military personnel who tried to vote in the 1980 Presidential election were unable to do so because they received their absentee ballots too late or not at all. This figure does not include military dependents and other overseas civilians. If they were included, the number of disenfranchised voters would be several hundred thousand.

The problem is that regardless of how early the voter applies for an absentee ballot, his or her local election official may not have ballots printed and ready to mail until less than 3 weeks before the election. In 43 States, local election officials do not count absentee ballots which are received after election day regardless of when the ballots are postmarked. The American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Reserve Officers Association have adopted national resolutions calling upon the States to mail absentee ballots at least 45 days before the election so that servicemen will be able to return their ballots in time to be counted.

The General Assembly of Virginia in my own State has passed, and Gov. Charles S. Robb has just signed, a bill to require local election officials to mail absentee ballots at least 45 days before the election. Several other States have passed similar reform bills in the last 2 years.

Much of the progress that has occurred is attributable to Mr. Wright. He has recruited more than 400 volunteers, mostly military reservists and retirees, to work on State and local election officials and State legislators. Upon request, he can provide specific information about the reforms that are needed in any particular State, along with the names and addresses of the volunteers working on this issue in that State. He can be contacted at 1201 South Scott Street, No. 422, Arlington, VA 22204.

The administration of absentee voting has traditionally been the responsibility of State and county governments. I don't want to shift that responsibility to Washington, but I do believe that Congress has a legitimate interest in ensuring that military personnel are not disenfranchised by the circumstances of their service and by State election procedures which do not make adequate accommodations for those circumstances.

In some States changes in the election calendar, such as changing the date of the primary, may be necessary to enable local election officials to mail absentee ballots at least 45 days before the election. I recognize that such changes may create some inconvenience for candidates and election officials, but it seems that these are small accommodations to facilitate the enfranchisement of our citizens who are abroad.

I call upon each of my colleagues to contact your Secretary of State or State Board of Elections to inquire as to when absentee ballots are mailed in your State. If you find they are mailed substantially less than 45 days before the election, I urge you to contact your State authorities and request that they take whatever administrative or legislative action is necessary to get the ballots mailed earlier. We must protect the right to vote for our citizens overseas.●

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT ANTITRUST ACT

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today two bills, both bearing the title "The Local Government Antitrust Act of 1984." Tough alternate approaches, both address the problems arising out of the increasing number of antitrust suits filed against local governments since 1978 when the Supreme Court first indicated that municipalities do not enjoy the same antitrust protection afforded States.

The Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law will meet to mark up local government antitrust legislation on July 25. The comments and suggestions that the subcommittee receives on the two alternate approaches will be grateful in guiding our action.

Without legislation, cities and other local governments may be saddled with substantial legal costs, or even treble-damage judgments. Worse yet, the threat of antitrust suits may paralyze local government, forestalling action in the public interest lest financial ruin befall public officials and the Public Treasury. We need a more rational and certain basis for determining when such suits should be entertained and what remedies should be available against local governments and their officials.

Although some relief for local governments is required, the record compiled by the subcommittee suggests that local governments occasionally do commit acts that have no legitimate purpose and that do substantial competitive injury to private businesses. An appropriate legislative solution should provide an injured business a private remedy for such abuses.

The first of these bills would provide local governments a standard for obtaining early dismissal of antitrust cases that challenge legitimate governmental activity. Injured parties, however, could still obtain injunctive relief and actual damages if they demonstrate that the local government's action was not reasonably undertaken to protect or provide for the public health, safety, or welfare, and violated the antitrust laws. But no damages or costs could be collected from local government officials personally, and the local government could collect attorney's fees against an unsuccessful plaintiff.

The second bill would avoid any substantive changes in the antitrust law. It eliminates monetary damages against local governments, their officials and agents by restricting the remedy available in private actions to injunctive relief. Under this proposal, local governments are also permitted the opportunity to recover attorneys' fees against an unsuccessful plaintiff. This alternative is somewhat similar to the approach taken in the bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee, but offers broader coverage by protecting all "official conduct" of local governments, whether or not such conduct is in connection with private parties in a particular market.

I am attaching more detailed explanations of the two bills.

EXPLANATION OF H.R. 5992, LOCAL GOVERNMENT ANTITRUST ACT OF 1984

SECTION 1—SHORT TITLE

THE SHORT TITLE OF THE ACT IS THE "LOCAL GOVERNMENT ANTITRUST ACT OF 1984"

SECTION 2—DEFINITIONS

This section sets forth definitions of key terms for the Act. The term "local government", of course, is central to the legislation. Local government is defined as "any general or specific purpose political subdivision established in accordance with the laws of any State in which such subdivision is located." Because the protections of the bill turn on the definition of "official conduct," as described below, there appears little need to distinguish between general and special purpose units, as some other bills in this area have attempted to do.

"Official conduct of a local government" is defined as "action by a local government or its officials, employees, or agents, in the reasonable exercise of such government's legislative, regulatory, executive, administrative, or judicial powers." This broadly drawn definition is intended to include any conduct that a local government official reasonably considers to be within his official duties. It would exclude conduct that a reasonable official would not construe to be within a local government's authority. Thus, at least a general delegation of authority from a State would be required. On the other hand, the requirement of a specific delegation (as mandated by the City of Boulder) is eliminated. Moreover, mere procedural or technical defects in a local government's exercise of its authority would not negate the protection.

It is important to note that under certain circumstances, the actions of third parties can fall within the definition of "official conduct". The Supreme Court first injected the term "state action" into antitrust jurisprudence in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341 (1943). "State action" describes a category of activities engaged in by a State as sovereign that is beyond the reach of the Sherman Act. In subsequent decisions, the Supreme Court has ruled that the actions of third parties partake of the State's antitrust immunity if such conduct is pursuant to a clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed state policy and if such conduct is actively supervised by the State. See e.g., California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n v. Midcal Aluminum, Inc., 445 U.S. 97 (1980). Thus, for purposes of the state action doctrine, antitrust protection applies to both public and private entities properly acting on behalf of a state. It is the State's involvement in an activity—and not the nature or identity of the party claiming to act on behalf of the State—that is determinative. Similarly, in the municipal antitrust context, it is the local government's involvement in an activity through the reasonable exercise of its powers, i.e., "official conduct," that is determinative of antitrust protection for either public or private parties. The definition of "official conduct", phrased in terms of "action by a local government," is thus crafted to incorporate, by analogy, the interpretive case law with respect to third party participation in "state action."

SECTION 3—SCOPE OF APPLICATION

The heart of this proposal is section 3, which provides a vehicle for prompt, threshold dismissal of antitrust suits that constitute an unwarranted interference with legitimate governmental functions. Section 3 establishes a jurisdictional test—the antitrust laws will not apply to official conduct of a local government "reasonable undertaken to protect or provide for the public health, safety, or welfare."

The protection of Section 3 extends not only to private suits but also to enforcement by the Department of Justice or the FTC. And this protection will apply regardless of whether the remedy sought is an injunction, damages, or a penal sanction.

The standard in Section 3 offers local government broad protection but stops short of a grant of absolute immunity. The phrase "reasonably undertaken" suggests a balancing of governmental and competitive factors. This wording reaches all legitimate governmental functions, including exercise of land use, police, or economic regulatory powers. Thus, even if conduct has anticompetitive effects, the antitrust laws would not apply if the conduct is, in the view of a reasonable man, undertaken to achieve a legitimate governmental purpose.

The protection of section 3 would not operate where a local government has acted without a reasonable basis that it is providing for the public health, safety, or welfare. In most instances, a court would not look beyond a local government's publicly stated rationale for taking action. If, however, it appears that an action has substantial anticompetitive impact and serves no reasonable governmental objective, the court can look beyond the stated rationale to determine the actual impact of official conduct. Evidence that the primary effect of local government action is to benefit one competitor over another or to reward friends or relatives of a city official could, for example, be weighed by a court in determining whether the action reasonably served governmental objectives.

A court might also consider whether the local government's action placed it in competition with private businesses. The antitrust laws would apply to a business run by a local government in competition with private firms if the business serves no significant public welfare or other legitimate governmental objective. But a local government's decision to provide a service in competition with private businesses would not necessarily deprive it of the protection of section 3. For example, a city-run ambulance to provide service to segments of the population otherwise not adequately served could be protected even if there is competition with a privately-run ambulance service. The city would lose the protection of section 3 only if, after weighing the social or other non-competitive objectives of the government's actions, a court determines that it acted unreasonably.

Section 3 does not require a local government to prove that it choose the least anticompetitive means of achieving a governmental objective. For example, there are a number of ways a city can determine to provide the population with vital public service. A city might choose to provide ambulance service to residents through a city-run ambulance, through an exclusive contract with a private business, through contracts with a number of private businesses, or through a combination of these means. In any of these instances, the city's conduct would be protected by section 3 if its pursuit of the governmental objective were reasonable.

Section 3 restricts the antitrust laws in their application to official conduct of a local government, regardless of the named parties in the suit. Thus, it would operate to the benefit of any defendant named in any antitrust suit alleging that a city's official conduct violated the antitrust laws. A plaintiff who sues both a city and parties who were responding to the city's official conduct would have no remedy against any of the defendants if the conduct met the test in section 3 (if the conduct fails this test, both governmental and private defendants could be liable). Private defendants named in such suits would continue to enjoy the protection of such decisions as Eastern Railroads Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127 (1961), which assures businesses the right to lobby for legislation with antitrust exposure.

In instances in which the local government conduct does not meet the test of section 3, the plaintiff is entitled to go forward under existing antitrust law to judgment. Depending on the type of violation alleged, the court will apply the per se rule or the rule or reason, just as in other antitrust cases. However, with respect to private suits, the remedies that will be available are limited by sections 4 and 5. And, pursuant to section 6, officials of local governments may not be held for damages, interest, costs, or attorney's fees in any private action challenging their official conduct.

SECTION 4—LIMITATIONS

Section 4 limits any assessment of damages in a private or State claim arising out of official conduct of a local government to the actual damages sustained, interest on the damages, and a reasonable attorney's fee.

Action by local governments that does not reasonably serve governmental objectives should not come at the expense of competitive injury to businesses. This section permits injured persons to obtain full economic compensation when such injury occurs. But at the same time, local governments (and taxpayers who ultimately foot the bill) will not be held for multiple damages.

As in the case of section 3, this provision benefits any person defending an antitrust claim arising out of official conduct of a local government, whether that person be the local government or a third party defending the same claim. Subsection (c) sets forth the standards for calculating interest on the damages.

SECTION 5—ATTORNEY'S FEE

This section provides for an award of costs and a reasonable attorney's fee to the substantially prevailing party in any claim arising out of official conduct of a local government. Thus, depending on the outcome of the litigation, attorneys' fees can be awarded to or assessed against a local government, or any other party to litigation involving such a claim.

The wording of this provision tracks a similar provision in the Joint Research and Development Act of 1984 (H.R. 5041) as passed by the House of Representatives earlier this year.

SECTION 6—LIABILITY OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

This section ensures that no local government official will be liable under the antitrust laws for damages, interest, costs or attorney's fees for any official conduct, even if such conduct is not protected under Section 3. Of course, this section does not preclude the application of other statutes (i.e., criminal laws aimed at corruption, bribery, or other impermissible actions taken by officials under the guise of official conduct).

EXPLANATION OF H.R. 5993

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ANTITRUST ACT OF 1984

SECTION 1—SHORT TITLE

THE SHORT TITLE OF THE ACT IS THE "LOCAL GOVERNMENT ANTITRUST ACT OF 1984"

SECTION 2—DEFINITIONS

This section sets forth definitions of key terms for the Act. The term "local government", of course, is central to the legislation. Local government is defined as "any general or specific purpose political subdivision established in accordance with the laws of any State in which such subdivision is located." Because the protections of the bill turn on the definition of "official conduct," as described below, there appears little need to distinguish between general and special purpose units, as some other bills in this area have attempted to do.

"Official conduct of a local government" is defined as "action by a local government or its officials, employees, or agents, in the reasonable exercise of such government's legislative, regulatory, executive, administrative, or judicial powers." This broadly drawn definition is intended to include any conduct that a local government official reasonably considers to be within his official duties. It would exclude conduct that a reasonable official would not construe to be within a local government's authority. Thus, at least a general delegation of authority from a State would be required. On the other hand, the requirement of a specific delegation (as mandated by the City of Boulder) is eliminated. Moreover, mere procedural or technical defects in a local government's exercise of its authority would not negate the protection.

It is important to note that under certain circumstances, the actions of third parties can fall within the definition of "official conduct." The Supreme Court first injected the term "state action" into antitrust jurisprudence in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341 (1943). "State action" describes a category of activities engaged in by a State as sovereign that is beyond the reach of the Sherman Act. In subsequent decisions, the Supreme Court has ruled that the actions of third parties partake of the State's antitrust immunity if such conduct is pursuant to a clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed State policy and if such conduct is actively supervised by the State. See e.g., California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n v. Midcal Aluminum, Inc., 445 U.S. 97 (1980). Thus, for purposes of the State action doctrine, antitrust protection applies to both public and private entities properly acting on behalf of a State. It is the State's involvement in an activity—and not the nature or identity of the party claiming to act on behalf of the State—that is determinative. Similarly, in the municipal antitrust context, it is the local government's involvement in an activity through the reasonable exercise of its powers, i.e., "official conduct," that is determinative of antitrust protection for either public or private parties. The definition of "official conduct," phrased in terms of "action by a local government," is thus crafted to incorporate, by analogy, the interpretive case law with respect to third party participation in "state action."

SECTION 3—LIMITATION ON RECOVERY

Section 3 works no substantive changes in the antitrust law. Instead, it provides local governments with immediate and certain remedial relief. It eliminates monetary damages against municipalities by restricting private parties to injunctive relief when challenging the "official conduct" of local governments, their officials and agents. Because the relief granted in Section 3 is tied to the "official conduct" of local governments, third parties involved in official conduct would also receive the benefit of the protection. Existing private remedies remain in place for antitrust plaintiffs injured by economic actions falling outside the official conduct of a local government.

Under Section 3, if the official conduct of a local government is challenged by a private party, the only relief available for an injured plaintiff would be an injunctive action brought under section 16 of the Clayton Act. As Section 16 makes clear, injunctive relief under the antitrust laws is treated by the Federal courts in exactly in the same manner as any other injunction suit brought under the courts' equitable jurisdiction. Thus, in accordance with Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, an antitrust plaintiff seeking a preliminary injunction against a party would have to meet the rather substantial burden of showing: (1) immediate or irreparable harm, and (2) probable success on the merits. Moreover, should a court find that the plaintiff has successfully met this burden and that a preliminary injunction should issue, the plaintiff would then have to post bond "for payment of such costs and damages as may be incurred or suffered by any party who is found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained." Federal Rule 65(C).

Thus, while Section 3 does not create a new substantive test, it does impose a substantial burden on plaintiffs at the outset of litigation. Plaintiffs who fail to secure a preliminary injunction will have to weigh carefully the costs of proceeding with the suit for a final disposition on the merits. This is particularly so since the bill also would grant a local government attorney's fees if it prevails in the antitrust action. See section 4. Taken together, the remedial aspects of this type of proposal should work to deter frivolous suits and to readjust the litigation advantages and disadvantages more equitably for local government defendants.

The remedy approach in this bill is somewhat similar to that taken by the Senate Judiciary Committee in reporting out S. 1578, but offers broader coverage by protecting all "official conduct" whether or not such conduct is in competition with private parties in a particular market. Although the presence of private parties in the marketplace is certainly an important factor to be considered in a competitive analysis, it should not by itself be determinative of whether the official conduct of a local government should receive the protection of this legislation.

In addition, there may be certain advantages to a remedy approach over a substantive approach in relieving some of the apprehensions and uncertainties of local governments at this time. Short of absolute immunity, a substantive standard that protects some but not all of a local government's activities based on a test of reasonableness could generate litigation with varying and uncertain application by the courts. At the very least, a remedy approach offers a measure of relief with certainty.

Finally, remedial relief may be the appropriate legislative response at this time when the Supreme Court is reconsidering the application of the state action doctrine to municipalities. On June 11, 1984, the Court granted certiorari for next term in two cases that may address some of the conceptual difficulties of the state action immunity as it relates to local governments. See Town of Hallie v. City of Eau Claire No. 82-1832, cert. granted June 11, 1984; and Southern Motor Carriers Rate Conference, Inc. v. United States, No. 82-1922, cert. granted, June 11, 1984.

SECTION 4—ATTORNEY'S FEES

This section provides for an award of costs and a reasonable attorney's fee to the substantially prevailing party in any claim arising out of official conduct of a local government. Thus, depending on the outcome of the litigation, attorney's fees can be awarded to or assessed against a local government, or any other party to litigation involving such a claim.

The wording of this provision tracks a similar provision in the Joint Research and Development Act of 1984 (H.R. 5041) as passed by the House of Representatives earlier this year.●

HONORING ELISA GARCIA LOPEZ

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the accomplishments of my dear friend, Elisa Garcia Lopez.

Mr. Speaker, this notable woman, slight of stature but a giant among men and women has greatly contributed to a better understanding between the young and old, between the community and its leaders, between nations.

Elisa, along with her family, migrated to Los Angeles from Mexico at the age of 5 months. She is fluent in English, Spanish, Italian, and Nahuatl, the language of the Aztecs. She also has studied Latin and Greek.

Elisa is recognized by her peers as a quintessential student of languages and exemplar author of short essays as well as poems. She has spent her life studying the Spanish language and its culture. In 1979 Elisa sponsored a literary contest in which entrants eulogized the life of Sor Juana Ines de la Cruz, a 17th century Mexican nun. Out of this literary contest, grew the Sociedad Literaria Educativa de Los Angeles—Educational Literary Society of Los Angeles. Since the first contest, the Sociedad has sponsored an annual literary contest in Spanish. This contest encourages student, amateur, and professional writers to improve their writing skills by contributing essays and poems on Hispanic culture.

Elisa has long been the voice of information to the Hispanic community of southern California. Her news, views, and commentaries on events in the community are well known through her broadcasting efforts over KTYM radio. Not content with reaching all audiences by airwaves, Elisa is a noted bilingual teacher at the Braille Institute for the Blind. Her efforts with war veterans as a Red Cross volunteer are laudable and has won her recognition many times over.

The city of Los Angeles is indeed honored to count with Elisa Lopez as one of its finest citizens. Both former Mayor Sam Yorty and Mayor Tom Bradley have honored her with meritorious resolutions. She has been the intellectual linkage between the nations of the Americas receiving the highest honors of the Organizations of American States [OAS] for her promotion of goals for peace and brotherhood.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring Elisa Lopez for her contributions not only to the ideals of our Nation but the international community as well.●

JUDY PUCCINI—CONGRESSIONAL PUBLIC SERVICE AWARD WINNER FOR SAN BRUNO

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, there can be no nobler gift than service. This year, in commemorating the Year of the Volunteer, I have initiated the Congressional Public Service Program. The purpose of this program is to recognize all volunteers through selecting one individual annually in each community in my Congressional District who has made an important volunteer public service contribution.

I am delighted today to inform the House of Representatives that the Congressional Public Service Advisory Committee of San Bruno has named Judy Puccini to receive the award for their community. I heartily concur in that choice.

Judy Puccini has found time to make her important volunteer service contribution in addition to family responsibilities. She gets high marks as a wife from her husband Frank, and she is a first class mother to two teenage children—Stephen, 17 and Beth, 16, both students at Capuchino High School.

Judy has devoted herself to working with young people, first as the president of the PTA of the John Muir Elementary School and also as a volunteer teacher of the Decide Curriculum, a successful drug and alcohol education program. She has served as PTA Health Commissioner for San Mateo County.

At Capuchino High School, she has been president of the CAP People, School Improvement Chairman, and a member of the board of directors of Parents Who Care—a drug and alcohol abuse program.

Mr. Speaker, Judy Puccini has shown her willingness to give of herself through volunteering her time to assist others and taking the lead in important programs to benefit our young people. I congratulate Judy and commend the San Bruno Congressional Public Service Advisory Committee for its excellent choice.●

TRIBUTE TO CINDY NOBLE AND VIC CLEARY

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues the achievements of two remarkable young people from Ohio, Miss Cindy Noble and Mr. Vic Cleary.

Cindy Noble was selected to represent the United States on the 1984 Olympic basketball team. She also made the team in 1980. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Noble of Clarksburg.

Cindy's parents can be justifiably proud of her accomplishment. It takes a great deal of discipline, determination and hard work to be a successful athlete. The personal striving and ability needed to achieve the status of Olympic athlete is even more noteworthy.

The Olympics give us reason to look to the future with optimism and hope because the Olympic spirit carries beyond the field of competition. On behalf of the residents of southern Ohio, I wish Miss Noble and the women's basketball team the best of luck in Los Angeles.

I also want to take this opportunity to congratulate Vic Cleary, a Ross County Junior High student who placed second in the Ohio National History Days Competition. This qualified him for the nationals at the University of Maryland. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Cleary of Clarksburg.

Both of these talented young people deserve our respect and admiration for their dedication and hard work. They represent the best of our Nation's youth and I extend to them my hearty congratulations and best wishes for their future.●

IN TRIBUTE TO SGT. JEFFREY D. YOUNG

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call your attention to the courage of a brave young man from my district, Sgt. Jeffrey D. Young, USMC, who sacrificed his life for his country while serving in Lebanon.

Last October, when a terrorist attack on our barracks in Beirut reaped the lives of 262 marines, Sergeant Young was among those killed. Sergeant Young, who hailed from Moorestown, NJ, lost his life defending the peace, freedom, and democracy our Nation cherishes. While he was with the Marine Corps, Jeffrey held the rank of Marine lance corporal. However, because of his important accomplishments and valuable contributions to the Marine Corps and to our Nation, Jeffrey was posthumously promoted to the rank of sergeant. Since in all of the initial reports of his death, Jeffrey was listed as a lance corporal, I wanted to bring the attention of my colleagues to Jeffrey's promotion and to offer my praise for the courage and bravery Sergeant Young exhibited while serving his country.

Although we mourn the tragic loss of Sergeant Young and the other 261 marines that died in Beirut, their memories should serve as a source of pride and honor to their parents and to all Americans.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleagues will join me in paying this tribute to Sgt. Jeffrey D. Young and expressing my deepest sorrow and regret to his family and his many friends.●

THE DEATH PENALTY 12 YEARS AFTER FURMAN AGAINST GEORGIA

HON. JOHN CONYERS

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 12th anniversary of the U.S. Supreme Court landmark decision in the case of Furman against Georgia, whereby the Justices of the Nation's highest court struck down every death penalty law in the United States.

The basis of that ruling was that the death penalty was being applied in an arbitrary, capricious, and racially discriminatory fashion.

In theory, the capital sentencing standards articulated after Furman were to have ushered in a new era of fairness. It was thought that new legal guidelines and jury instructions would solve the problem of arbitrariness and racial discrimination in the application of the death penalty. Today, these safeguards have lost their meaning.

Studies show that a defendant is from 5 to 10 times more likely to be sentenced to death for killing a white victim than a black victim. Our Nation's death row is almost 50 percent nonwhite and is overwhelmingly poor.

There are now over 1,350 men and women under the sentence of death in this country, 20 people have been executed since the Furman decision, 13 in the past 9 months alone. With the specter before us of a dramatically accelerated rate of executions, we cannot continue to tolerate a capital punishment system that continues to be subject to charges of racial and economic unfairness. During the past 12 years many new organizations and individuals have become sensitized to the basic unfairness of the death penalty. Responsible policy dictates that these issues be closely scrutinized. It is never too late to choose a wiser and fairer course.●

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FEDERAL CREDIT UNION ACT

HON. CONNIE MACK

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, this week is a very important week for our Nation's Federal credit unions. It was 50 years ago that President Roosevelt signed into law the Federal Credit Union Act. This legislation gave rise to the development of financial cooperatives chartered by the Federal Government with the specific statutory purpose of "promoting thrift among its members and creating a source of credit for provident or productive purposes."

Representative Wright Patman—Democrat of Texas—father of our colleague Representative BILL PATMAN—Democrat of Texas—and my grandfather, Senator Morris Sheppard—Democrat of Texas—played essential roles in securing passage of the Federal Credit Union Act on the final day of the 73d Congress.

With the permission of my colleagues, I would ask that an excerpt from the biography of my grandfather, Senator Morris Sheppard, be inserted in the RECORD at this point:

In line with his long-time advocacy of the promotion of the economic independence of the individual citizen, Sheppard during this term took an active part in supporting the credit union movement. In a statement of his record prepared for use in his 1936 campaign, Sheppard described the functioning and general effect of these organizations as follows:

"Through self-sustaining cooperative methods, members of these unions become systematic savers and can obtain loans in comparatively small amounts from a fund established by their own contributions for necessary and provident purposes, at low rates of interest, the general use of the credit union by the American people will mean an increased purchasing power of two or three billion dollars a year through relief from the enormous interest rates charged for small loans by loanshark organizations."

In 1934, Sheppard wrote and obtained passage of the Federal Credit Union Act, which enabled credit unions to organize under Federal law, and which Sheppard described as "a heavy blow at the private loan shark system, which diverts from normal channels of trade billions of dollars through exorbitant interest charges running as high as forty-two percent and even higher." As Sheppard pointed out, this Act was the only New Deal legislation to originate on Capitol Hill during that Congressional session.

The passage of this bill was followed by the organization of numerous federal credit unions throughout the country. The first such organization to be chartered under the new Act was the "Morris Sheppard Federal Credit Union", founded on October 1, 1934, by city and county employees in Texarkana, Texas. By 1936, over 1,400 such institutions had been founded and their combined funds amounted to more than a million dollars. Sheppard's additional activities in support of these institutions have been described (in a document prepared by his office) as follows:

"When the Credit Unions were threatened with eviction from Federal buildings, Senator Sheppard introduced and actively supported legislation permitting them to maintain quarters in Federal buildings and appealed to the President, the Comptroller General and the Post Office Department for an extension of time to enable necessary legislation to be passed, keeping in immediate touch with the situation until necessary legislation was enacted which removed dangers of this kind in the future. He was also the author of a consolidated Credit Union Act providing for a number of needed Amendments to the original Act, including inter-lending between Credit Unions, the right to invest money in Federal Savings and Loan Associations and research and publications of studies concerning Credit Union needs and possibilities."

Sheppard's Credit Union Act received favorable comment in the press. For example, an editorial in the St. Louis Post Dispatch for June 14, 1934, entitled "The Small Borrower Gets a Break," remarked of this measure "The New Deal has indeed done something for the little fellow." The Dallas News of May 14, 1934, had this to say:

"Senator Sheppard's sponsorship of the Federal credit union bill may serve in the long run to perpetuate the memory of his public service longer than will his advocacy and unyielding defenses of prohibition. For the uniform success of the small groups aided by Edward Filene has established this type of credit source available to the small wage earner and the Federal assistance offered will widen the scope of this service.

"The News has argued for the small loan system recommended by the Russell Sage Foundation and believes that its legalization by the State is of benefit to earners in low brackets. But the Credit Union is a much better device, subject to the drawback that, as a group enterprise, it is open only to group members. If credit unions are widely established and the State permits banks to go into the small loan business on the Sage Foundation plan, the real usurer cannot long exist."

My grandfather's memory and his commitment to credit unions has been perpetuated. The first Federal credit union chartered under the 1934 act was the Morris Sheppard Federal Credit Union. The active involvement of the extended Sheppard family in promoting the interests of our Nation's Federal credit unions continues today in the person of E.Y. "Ted" Holt. My cousin Ted is carrying on the Sheppard family legacy in his capacity as Deputy Executive Vice President/Finance of the National Association of Federal Credit Unions [NAFCU].

It is a great honor to be part of this legacy and see it endure, not only through Ted Holt's involvement, but through the many thousands of Federal credit unions throughout the United States today whose contribution we salute this week.●

EMIGRATION POLICY OF THE SOVIET UNION

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am participating in the 1984 Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil for Soviet Jews because of the importance of the plight of Soviet Jews. We must continue to stress to the Soviet leadership that its treatment of its Jewish citizens violates their human rights and international law. We must also work to maintain international pressure on the Soviet leadership to change its policies.

In particular, I would like to address the emigration policies of the Soviet Union and the way in which these policies are used against Jews. First, however, I want to emphasize that the right to emigrate is well established in international law. The Soviet Union is itself party to treaties and agreements guaranteeing this right, and yet it continually denies or delays this right to its citizens.

The case of the Taratuta family illustrates of official methods of harassment of those seeking to emigrate. The Taratutas are a Soviet Jewish family consisting of Abe Taratuta, his wife Ida, and their son Misha. They first applied for a visa in May 1973. Three months later they were notified that their application had been refused because Ida was subject to a "secret classification." This is a common excuse for refusing visas, and in this case it clearly had no foundation. Ida worked as a translator of English and American scientific articles, but at no time did she translate any classified articles, and all of the work she translated was freely available in libraries. In addition, she left her work before applying for a visa for fear her job might jeopardize her and her family's chances of being granted a visa. Obviously, her fear was well founded, but unfortunately, her preventive action did not pay off.

Aba had also taken the precaution of resigning from his job before applying for a visa. A graduate of Leningrad University in mathematics-radio astronomy, he had worked as a mathematician in a government office. In June 1976, Aba was told that he would not receive a visa for at least 10 years. He was later called to the visa office and told that he and his family had no hope for obtaining visas for at least 10 years because he had been engaged in "secret" work.

In January 1978, Aba was told by the KGB that he had been violating Soviet law for several years. The KGB warned him not to talk to foreigners and instructed him to sign a document relating to the warning which had been issued under an unpublished law providing for warnings for "anti-social behaviour that may result in leakage of information." Aba refused to sign since he had left his job as a mathematician several years before, and even while thus employed had had no dealings with classified material. He was threatened with prosecution.

Misha applied for a visa separately from his parents in November 1978, but without result. In August 1979, he was failed in his physics exam for entrance to the Institute of Mineralogy; he received his results much later than the rest of the students and an hour too late to appeal the examiners' decision. He now faces the possibility of being conscripted into the army after which he could be refused a visa for 10 or more years.

In the beginning of 1980, Ida was forbidden to use the public library because of a new rule which states that unemployed persons may not use libraries. In April 1980, the KGB searched the Taratutas' apartment, confiscated their books, pens and pencils, typewriter, and addresses of friends in the West, and interrogated Aba.

Aba and Ida currently work at a salary of less than half of their former salaries. Aba is a lift maintenance operator, and Ida teaches English at home. They continue to wait for their visas to be approved.

This is the type of harassment and delaying tactics habitually used by Soviet officials to discourage and prevent emigration. It is a clear violation of international law and must be ended.●

SOVIETS RAILROAD REFUSENIK ZUNSHINE TO LABOR CAMP

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, for several months I have been actively following the plight of Zachar and Tatyana Zunshine. On March 15, 1984, I had the opportunity to speak with Tatyana Zunshine on the telephone from my Washington office. During our telephone conversation Tatyana described to me the persecution she and her husband had suffered as a result of applying for emigration visas.

In early March Zachar Zunshine was arrested following his attempt to appeal a government decision to refuse him and his wife permission to emigrate. Out of concern over his arrest, over 100 House Members joined me in writing Secretary General Chernenko to express our views on the treatment Zachar and Tatyana Zunshine had been subjected to.

Following his arrest Mr. Zunshine was charged with spreading anti-Soviet slander. Since his arrest a widespread effort mounted to protest his unjust arrest. However, I am sorry to have to report today that Zachar Zunshine was sentenced to 3 years in a labor camp as punishment for his so-called criminal acts.

In the free world, we know that Zachar Zunshine is not a criminal. He and his wife are guilty only of having expressed a desire to live in Israel.

And the Soviet authorities know that Zachar Zunshine is not really a criminal. They resorted to a mock trial with no semblence of justice in their attempt to prove Zachar's guilt. A week ago the authorities agreed to allow Tatyana to serve as counsel to her husband during his trial. Yesterday, they reversed their decision and denied her permission to represent her husband. At the trial, the authorities refused to allow the defense to present witnesses. Following this unbalanced trial, it comes as no surprise that Zachar was found guilty. In protest against his unfair trial and unjust sentence, Zachar Zunshine has announced his plan to begin a hunger strike.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my concern over the treatment of Zachar Zunshine and other Soviet refuseniks is shared by many Members of the Congress, by our constituents, and others living in the free world. I urge my colleagues to raise their voices in protest against the treatment of Zachar Zunshine. We must continue to call attention to the abuses of the Soviet Union and their continued harassment of Soviet Jews and other minorities who are denied their fundamental freedoms.●

CONRAIL READY FOR PRIVATE SECTOR

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to alert the Members of the House who are concerned about our transportation system that we are approaching an important decision in the history of rail transportation in this country. Particularly Members in the Northeast and Midwest should be aware that work will soon begin on a decision which will have an important effect on the economic life of the region.

The Department of Transportation has solicited bids for the sale of the Government interest in Conrail. It appears that the administration will soon reach a decision about how it will recommend to the Congress that Conrail be sold.

As some of the Members may be aware, I have expressed concern about decisions made by the Department of Transportation and I have expressed some skepticism about offers that have been made. I believe it is critically important that the billions of dollars that the House has approved since 1970 to ensure a sound rail transportation system in the Northeast and Midwest not be wasted.

Along with the many other Members who have worked so hard on rail issues, and particularly on preseving a sound rail system to serve the economy of the Northeast and Midwest, I believe Conrail should be turned over to the private sector. In 1981, the Northeast Rail Service Act (NERSA) was put together to give Conrail the opportunity to become profitable and to set in motion a process to turn it over to the private sector. Fortunately that act has worked well, with Conrail earning over $300 million last year and expected to earn over $500 million this year.

The goal of turning Conrail over to the private sector remains a good one. I am sure that all who worked on NERSA are pleased that we now find ourselves in a position to examine how we return railroading in the Northeast and Midwest to private hands.

The process is not without dangers, however. NERSA states that any sale should ensure continued rail service and maximize the return to the Federal Government, objectives which are as important today as they were when NERSA was passed. The Federal investment of over $7 billion, and the sacrifices made by all the parties, including the employees, the shippers, the States, and other carriers, require that we move with caution so as not to sacrifice the gains we have made.

At the same time, there is no reason to delay action if we have an offer which meets the objectives. Conrail, its employees and management have demonstrated that they can compete, and compete effectively, with others, and that they can earn enough money to survive without Government assistance. Conrail is ready to join the private sector.

I look forward to working to carry out the goals set forth by the House in NERSA in 1981. I am hopeful that one of the bids which will be made for Conrail will meet the needs of rail service in the Northeast and Midwest and provide an adequate return to the Government on its interest in Conrail.

As the chairman of the subcommittee with jurisdiction over this issue, I am eager to work with the Members of the House to see to it that we have a good sale of Conrail as soon as we can, a sale that will meet the goals set by the House.

For the information of the Members, the article that follows provides some background on the status of the Department's attempts to recommend a buyer to the Congress.

The following material was submitted for the RECORD:

ALLEGHANY'S OFFER FOR CONRAIL SEEMS TO BE ON WINNING COURSE AT DOT

DOT/GOLDMAN, SACHS ACCEPTANCE OF ALLEGHANY'S OFFER FOR CONRAIL AS 'FAIR COMPENSATION' SET PRICE PARAMETERS WHILE HASTE DILUTED CARRIER'S VALUE—LABOR FACING TOUGH CHOICES, COULD BLOCK SALE

(By Don Byrne)

Under the Department of Transportation's current structuring of the sale of Conrail the Alleghany Corp. has to be the clear "winner" and, either by intent or happenstance, that apparently was meant to be the result from the outset.

For weeks before its April 10 bid was made public, Alleghany, the DOT and Goldman, Sachs & Co., DOT's adviser on the sale, were in secret negotiations. Alleghany made it clear in its announcement that (a) it would go no higher than the $1 billion price tag it put on its bid and (b) the deal had to be consummated fast.

Eight days after the Alleghany bid, the DOT produced a letter from Goldman, Sachs saying the Alleghany offer was ". . . within the fair range of compensation to the government . . ." and set a June 18 cutoff on bids.

The DOT/Goldman, Sachs finding on Alleghany's offer set the pattern on what price would be paid for Conrail because if DOT/Goldman, Sachs had determined $1 billion to be fair, why should any bidder go much higher?

The Alleghany offer also set some pretty good terms for labor's support and labor's support was necessary if the sale proposal was to be approved in time to meet Alleghany's deadline. Thus, Alleghany's offer, and its acceptance as fair by the DOT, put labor in a commanding position that is otherwise would not have had. It is possible for labor to block a sale this year simply by saying it doesn't like the offer. It might not be possible for labor to do so a couple of years down the road.

The only other offer that labor likes at all is one from a string of investors headed by hotel magnate J. Willard Marriott, Jr. Most observers feel that the Marriott offer was not made to stand alone, that it was in fact crafted to include labor but that final agreement could not be worked out between the parties.

DOT has publicly stated that there is no great haste to sell Conrail, but the fact of the matter is DOT is pushing Goldman, Sachs to get its "analysis" finished within the week. DOT cannot possibly succeed in getting enabling legislation through this Congress unless it has a consensus which includes labor and shippers as well as Congress. Labor has already given tentative support to the Alleghany offer and Alleghany says it is lining up extensive shipper support.

Alleghany is laboring mightily in the halls of Congress and in the media around the country to advance its proposition. To smooth the path it has retained the public relations firm of Hill & Knowlton and has added, as supporters, former Deputy Transportation Secretary John Barnum and attorney Thomas Allison, who was a key staff figure on the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee when Conrail was created. Former Transportation Secretary Drew Lewis also has added his support to the Alleghany bid through contract with key congressmen.

DOT concedes that legislation will be necessary to accomplish the sale of Conrail and one of the key congressmen who must handle that legislation Representative James J. Florio (D-N.J.), has indicated he is less than enamored of the prospect of an Alleghany takeover of Conrail. Senator John Heinz (R-Pa.) has also expressed reservations about Alleghany's role in past New York Central-Pennsylvania Rail Road happenings. There is some thinking that DOT may attempt to go around the committees that should handle the Conrail sale and have the enabling legislation attached as a rider to some key money bill. This would not seem to be a likely solution to the problem.

Of the other bidders, it would simply not be possible to sell Conrail to any of the rail companies that bid without extensive negotiations with both labor and other competing or connecting railroads. Most of the remainder of the bids are from syndicates. Investment syndicates are not put together to run railroads; they are put together to make money through subsequent sale of the stock or property of the acquired company or because of tax reasons. There are also some bids from persons as yet unidentified by the DOT.

The question that occurs to most observers, including some of the congressmen important to the procedure, is, why the rush?

By indicating its desire for speed, the DOT has lowered the potential price of the railroad, aside from its dealings with Alleghany, because a distressed sale is not a good deal for the seller. In addition, Conrail at this point has only two years of profitable operations and those profits are subject to a great deal of scrutiny.

Last year Conrail turned a $313 million profit but that included $120 million of wage deferrals and $25 million, approximately, in unpaid local taxes. If, indeed, Conrail is right, and the decade-long traffic decline in the northeast has bottomed out, would it not be wise to wait a couple of years to pile up some profits and a good track record, thus raising the price?

On the other side of that coin, if the CSX Corp. and the Norfolk Southern Corp. are right in their thinking that the northeast is only big enough for two railroads and traffic volume continues to sink, would DOT not be better advised to wait and see what pattern takes place before selling off Conrail? DOT does not want Conrail back. But if traffic does continue to decline and the northeast is once again faced with a loss of rail service due to the financial failure of Conrail, are the DOT and Congress prepared to once again step in and take it over?—and to re-buy Conrail?

Labor also would seem to have to make a choice at this point: Does it go ahead and participate with its 12 percent wage holddown in place, or does it not participate and see what Conrail offers in wage negotiations? The 39-month agreement whereby the unions gave up 12 percent runs out this month.

Labor can also retain the 15 percent of the company it owns through the ESOP plan (that was not connected to the wage downhold, it was created by Congress as part of a 1978 funding act), get its wages restored and be in a position to block any sale. Labor could also get involved with Alleghany and receive more stock ownership through further wage concessions and then be in a position of sufficient stockholder clout to influence any subsequent sale of Conrail by Alleghany.

When Congress does get its hands on the DOT-recommended offer two persons will have a great deal of influence on what Congress ultimately decides. The two men in question are L. Stanley Crane, Conrail's chairman, and Stephen Berger, the chairman of the U.S. Railway Association. Both men have more or less kept the peace on the various offers but prior statements by both Mr. Crane and Mr. Berger indicate they do not favor a bid from a competing railroad or perhaps even from Alleghany because they consider the offer leveraged.

The one voice that hasn't been heard is that of the public, which right now, through Congress, has some $7.56 billion of its tax dollars invested in the railroad. Conrail's physical plant and rolling stock is worth $4.399 billion. In addition, it has current assets, including $675 million in cash, of $1.7 billion, for a total net worth of $5.7 billion. It also stands to make about $400 million this year in net profits, has depreciable assets of about $3 billion and will be practically debt-free after transfer. Is this corporation worth "only" $1 billion?

Something to be sold is worth only what the market will pay for it. But did the DOT give the marketplace a chance to work in its haste to unload Conrail for political or ideological reasons? It would seem not.●

LEHRMAN'S ECONOMIC STRATEGY

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I commend to my colleagues' attention the following article by Lewis E. Lehrman. Mr. Lehrman's article marshals the facts of economic history and current economic conditions, both domestic and international, to support the idea of reestablishing a sound dollar based on a gold standard.

Mr. Lehrman's article has the distinction of presenting an integrated approach to all our economic problems. He is interested in more than the pernicious effects of the Federal Reserve's erratic monetary policy—he presents some fiscal policy proposals and an interim monetary policy which should be implemented before a gold standard is put in place.

Given the integrated state of the world economy and the dollar's role as the international reserve currency, Mr. Lehrman's prescription should be seen as a thoughtful and constructive program to restore the economic health of the industrialized countries and the developing world. It is my hope that it will receive serious attention in Congress and in the administration.

The article follows:

GOLDEN ANTIDOTE TO HIGH INTEREST

(By Lewis E. Lehrman)

The threat of inflation and punitive interest rates is the transcendent economic issue of our times. This financial disorder is to our generation what depression and the tragedy of unemployed were to our parents and grandparents. Searching the 200-year history of the Industrial Revolution to find a full decade of average interest rates as high as those during the period of 1974 to 1984, it is necessary to go back to the French Revolution and the total financial collapse of France in the years 1789 to 1799. The modern history of interest rates shows that in periods such as ours there has been only one way to return to relatively low, long-term interest rates, and that is by a monetary order based on a gold-backed currency.

For example, the period of the American Revolution was a time of paper-money hyperinflation, immense budget deficits and high interest rates (for example, 26% to 40% on long-term government bonds in 1787). As a result of this experience, the founders in 1789 established the new constitutional republic upon the bedrock of a currency and credit reform—largely the initiative of Alexander Hamilton. Through the Coinage Act of 1792 he influenced the public debt and established a convertible dollar, based on a gold-and-silver standard. As a result, low fixed interest rates of 6½% to 7½% for long-term government bonds became commonplace. After the monetary reform, between 1792 and 1801, budget deficits were actually exceeded by budget surpluses. A decade of economic boom without inflation followed domestic monetary reform.

RESTORATION OF GOLD FRANC

By means of a very similar monetary reform—restoration of the gold franc—Napoleon ended the French revolutionary period of inflation, floating exchange rates and high interest rates (average yields of 34% in 1799 on government bonds). These high interest rates, like our own, had been brought about by government-manipulated "assignats," the inconvertible paper-money issues of the French revolutionary government. The return to gold convertibility brought down interest rates to 6% (or lower) on government bonds from 1806—with a few years' exceptions—until World War I.

As recently as 1959, after two decades of a flexible franc and comparatively high interest rates, French President Charles DeGaulle and Prof. Jacques Rueff reformed the domestic monetary system and launched the Fifth Republic on a decade of economic growth exceeding even Germany's growth. The Rueff reforms restored a franc covertible to gold, ended France's inflation, lowered interest rates, led to a balanced budget and linked the gold franc to the Bretton Woods system of fixed exchange rates.

A century and a half earlier in Britain, the 1819-1821 restoration of the gold standard had ended an era of comparatively high interest rates, floating exchange rates and parliamentary paper-money experiments. These experiments also had begun during the Anglo-Napoleonic wars—a 24-year financial nightmare (1795-1819) of alternating wartime inflation and peacetime austerity and deflation. For example, British long-term government bonds yielded 3% to 4.5% from 1735 to 1785. From 1795, when pound convertibility was suspended, yields almost doubled, peaking at nearly 7% in 1798. But in expectation of the return to gold convertibility of the paper pound in 1819, yields declined almost 50%, and continued thereafter. The capital markets of London revived, undergirded by sterling convertibility to gold, and offered interest rates of 2% to 4% for British government bonds for almost a century.

In 1879, the U.S. officially ended a 17-year epoch of inconvertibility and financial disorder. The Civil War and Reconstruction period, with its paper money ("greenbacks") and floating exchange rates, was also marked by comparatively high interest rates. For example, the average yield on long-term government bonds during the 1850s was 4.33%. In the first year after the suspension of dollar convertibility in 1861-62, yields ran about 50% higher, to average about 6.5%. Peak rates also occurred in 1861-1862—6.75% as measured in greenback yields, higher if measured in gold prices.

During Reconstruction, in expectation of the return of gold convertibility in 1879, market yields on long-term government bonds declined to 3.75%, a 40% decline from the peak in 1861-1862. During the decade after dollar convertibility was restored (1879-1889), average yields declined radically to 2.13% in 1889, averaging 2.71% for the entire decade. The U.S. monetary reform of 1879 had reestablished a necessary condition of low interest rates—the gold dollar—and linked it to the international monetary order of the day, a general system of multinational currency convertibility and free trade, upheld at the center by the convertible, gold-backed British pound.

Why do free convertible currencies and an international monetary order, based on the gold standard, produce such positive financial effects? Because only a fixed value for any unit of measurement can bestow reliability and trust on the chosen standard. Faith in a just and listing value for an objective standard of economic measurement and exchange, namely money, is crucial for commerce. Confidence in the fixed value of the monetary standard, the measuring rod of economic value, is similar to our enduring trust in the fixed value for the principal measure of length, the yardstick—always 36 inches. Who would arbitrarily depreciate the value of the yardstick to 30 inches tomorrow or gradually augment its value to 40 inches one year from now?

That is precisely the aribitrary power we give today to the Federal Reserve—to depreciate and appreciate the value of the monetary yardstick, the dollar. That's because there is no longer any legal requirement to maintain the value of the monetary standard—that is, a stable dollar, a convertible currency. And because of universal floating exchange rates, the Fed is in fact free, through open-market operations, to increase or decrease the supply of credit and money without limit. The financial markets are fully aware of this fact, reminded as they are by the open-market operations of the New York Fed at 11:45 a.m. almost every day. Indeed, total Federal Reserve financial-market purchases and sales of government securities have reached $2 trillion in a single year. Imagine the destabilizing effect of $2 trillion of government purchases and sales in the market for any other product.

By means of open-market operations, the Fed creates and destroys bank money without creating or removing new goods and services during the same market period. Thus, on the one hand, too expansive open-market purchases of government securities by the Fed cause demand to exceed supply at prevailing prices and inflation gets under way, as happened between 1977 and 1980. Or, on the other hand, open-market sales of government securities by the Fed often reduce credit too abruptly and cause demand to fall short of supply, and a drift toward deflation gets under way. This happened in the fourth quarter of 1981 and more recently in the third week of this past May when, just after the collapse of Continental Illinois, the Fed sold $4.1 billion of government securities, leading to the largest ever weekly drop in Federal Reserve credit. Uncertainty about such Fed operations has raised the risk premium in interest rates.

Only a fixed monetary standard can abolish this risk premium in long-term interest rates and renew faith in the fixed value of all future money payments on borrowings (bonds, mortgages, stocks and other long-term financial contracts). Confidence in the stable future purchasing power of a convertible dollar leads directly to a boom in the supply of savings offered for long periods at fixed, low rates. This new supply of savings will tend to lower the price of credit, i.e. interest rates. Only a real currency, legally convertible to gold at a fixed rate, can bring about these effects in the capital markets. That is why the Constitution of our country—originating as it did in 1789 after a catastrophic inflation of the previous currency of the Continental Congress ("not worth a Continental")—upholds a gold- or silver-backed currency.

In this general understanding, a comprehensive economic reform, containing the solutions to the related problems of inflation, the budget deficit, high interest rates and the hidden threat of deflation follows directly from the analysis:

(1) Reduce as rapidly and humanely as possible the federal budget deficit. But the president cannot currently control the deficit without using an indiscriminate, broad-brush veto of multibillion-dollar appropriations bills. The president needs the line-item veto he has requested and the legal forces of a constitutional amendment in order to require Congress to balance the budget annually in the future.

(2) The economic-reform program also should include a renovation of the federal tax structure—a low, simple, fair flat tax. This would create compelling incentives for more work, saving, investment, new jobs and the production of new goods, and therefore tend to balance supply-and-demand conditions in the market through economic growth, without creating disincentives by raising tax rates. In truth, an authentic demand for a balanced budget and low interest rates can only mean a demand for raising tax revenues through rapid economic growth without inflation.

NEW MONETARY PHILOSOPHY NEEDED

(3) At the same time, the Fed must abandon its failed quantitative monetary targeting. A new Federal Reserve monetary philosophy must be adopted—one that will supply, at market rates, the new money and credit currently needed by small enterprises, farms and entrepreneurs for the profitable production of new goods and services. So long as new money is borrowed at market rates to create new goods and services, there can be no inflation. If the ratio of new goods to new credit stays approximately in balance over the long term, it does not matter how much new credit and money is created.

(4) This new Fed target should be part of a domestic and international monetary reform designed to restore a gold-backed dollar.

We know that sustained economic growth and full employment require a long-term investment boom and the rebuilding of a competitive American economy. And that a long-term investment boom requires the means to finance it. To restore ample long-term bond markets at low, fixed interest rates, we must ensure the value of all future money payments to those willing to lend their savings for the long term. This means, by every careful study of history, a true and reliable monetary standard, and only a gold or silverbacked currency has been the honest money of history.

A COLLEGE OF PEACE

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, Wilmington College in Clinton County, OH, is different from other institutions of higher learning. At Wilmington, world peace is as high a priority as education.

During the past two decades, Wilmington College has dedicated itself to the pursuit of peace. It's latest effort is the Woolman Peace Institute, which was established in 1980 and is named in honor of John Woolman, a famous 18th century Quaker author.

This program and others reflect the school's Quaker heritage. It is because of that heritage and dedication to peace that I introduced legislation last year to place a U.S. Academy of Peace and Conflict Resolution at Wilmington College.

A recent article in the Cincinnati Enquirer describes the commitment of Wilmington College toward the study of peace and its dedication to easing world tensions.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring this article to the attention of my colleagues. The article follows:

ANTI-WAR ZONE: WILMINGTON COLLEGE GIVES PEACE CENTER A HOME

(By Randy McNutt)

WILMINGTON.—At Wilmington College, peace and education have been the priorities throughout the decades.

While many other colleges were building monuments of steel and glass in the last 20 years, this tiny school of 850 students was founding programs about peace, designed to reflect the school's Quaker hertige.

The latest such project is the Woolman Peace Institute. Actually, it isn't new. But when it was established in 1980, it didn't have a home base.

Now the program, which has gained popularity among students because it give them practical experience in self-reliance and cooperation, has found a home. The university has purchased 24 acres adjoining the campus for institute headquarters.

Is was named in honor of John Woolman, a well-known Quaker and author of such books as A Plea for the Poor and John Woolman's Journal, who spent most of his life in New Jersey and Pennsylvania and died in 1772 at the age of 50.

At Wilmington College, students can learn as much about peace as any other subject.

Students can also participate in the college's Peace Studies Program, a series of classes and courses designed to teach students about conciliation in this bellicose world. Students may choose from among such courses as "International Conflict," "War and Peace" and "Economic History."

College officials believe the peace studies will prepare students for careers in sensitive leadership positions, or just help them understand their responsibilities as citizens.

They can also browse through the Peace Memorial Resource Center, a house on campus where books and materials that tell of the terror of the atomic bombings of Japan in World War II have been collected.

Co-ordinator Sterling Olmsted said the Woolman Institute offers special courses and seminars such as "Woolman and Gandhi," "Philosophies of Self-Reliance" and "Management As If People Mattered." But now, he added, the institute will actually have a base to work from.

We have interested students, and now we have the land we need and we are ready to go ahead and develop it," Olmsted explained. "This is an educational project, and we want to involve students all the way through planning, building and operating the institute."

He said the wooded part of the new site will be managed by the college's biology department as a natural area. The remaining 15 acres will be developed by the institute's staff, with student participation.

Olmsted said the purpose of the Woolman Institute is to help people understand the interdependent world they live in, and to take some responsibility for it. "We're talking about learning practical skills, self-reliance and cooperation—things we need and which we are in danger of losing," he added.

A small house and barn on the property will be used as an office for the Institute and will also serve as a residence by the husband-and-wife team who will direct the development of the site.

Of the 24 acres, Olmsted said, several acres of flat land can be used as gardens and for growing fruit trees, and a hillside will be the eventual location of living quarters for a dozen students. They will work together, raise their own food and experiment with alternative technologies, he noted.

Olmsted said all of this is representative of the ideas and practices of John Woolman.

"He is probably best known for his opposition to slavery, but he was also much aware of what he called 'the connection of things,'" Olmsted said. "He saw a connection between war, slavery and injustice, and the way people lived.

"He tried to simplify his life, partly because he didn't want to be responsible for war, slavery and injustice, and partly because he wanted to be independent enough to work for what he believed in."

U.S. Rep. Bob McEwen, R-Hillsboro, would like to locate a national peace institute at Wilmington College, but this week his colleagues voted to locate such a center near Washington, D.C.●

A MUSICAL TRIBUTE TO ERIC DOLPHY

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, this Saturday Ms. Vi Redd and friends will present a musical tribute to the great American musician, Eric Dolphy, Jr., on the 20th anniversary of his death.

Eric Dolphy grew up in Los Angeles, playing the clarinet in school bands and orchestras throughout the city. Among his many teachers were Soccoro Pirolo, Merle Johnson and the venerable Lloyd Reese. In 1950, Eric enlisted in the Army and was sent to Tacoma, WA, where he played in the 21st Army Band and played with the Tacoma Symphony. Following his discharge he returned to Los Angeles to pursue a career as a professional musician.

His first recording session was with Roy Porter's Black California Big Band in the late forties. He played with all the greats that came to Los Angeles, from Duke Ellington to Dizzy Gillespie. Eric was always active in church music at his own People's Independent Church of Christ and also at Westminister Presbyterian Church.

Eric later joined with his old friend, Charles Mingus, and played in New York and throughout Europe. This liasion established itself as one of the driving forces behind modern music. He recorded over 60 albums as a sideman and recorded 18 of his own albums within a span of 6 years. Although Eric may have died 20 years ago, he lives on in the contributions he made to the music world.●

DAVID GUTIERREZ RECOGNIZED

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute a fine young athlete from San Diego, David Gutierrez. This 19-year-old welterweight boxer is a source of pride for his family, his school, and his community.

David began boxing at the age of 11, with his father, Max Gutierrez, serving as his first coach and trainer. Since then, David has perfected his skills and become a force to reckon with in amateur boxing.

His parents, Max and Alejandrina, are justly proud of their son's accomplishments in the ring. David is also a scholar, having served as Montgomery High School's student body president, while carrying an A-minus average. He will enter the University of California at San Diego this fall to continue his education.

It is, of course, boxing which is David's first love. In 1978, he fought his first amateur fight in Tijuana, Mexico, where he won by a knockout. He continued his rise to the top in 1979 by winning the San Diego district title and the California regionals. He would have gone on to the nationals, but at age 14, he was too young.

In 1980 and 1981, he again won both the San Diego and California titles and went on to win the 1981 Junior Olympics Championship. David repeated his sweep of the local and regional titles in 1982. He proceeded to the quarterfinals at the Charlotte U.S. Amateur Championship and the semifinals at the Indianapolis U.S. Amateur Championship. At this point, David was ranked the No. 4 welterweight boxer in the country.

Last year, David suffered a setback by losing the regional title for the first time. He has bounced back from defeat this year by being invited to participate in the U.S. Olympic trials in Colorado Springs. He advanced to a second round of the Olympic trials at Fort Worth, TX. There, David was defeated in the finals by the current world amateur champion, Mark Breland. During the televised final match, Howard Cosell praised David's gutsy performance and determination. He is currently the No. 3 welterweight in the United States.

David's sportsmanlike attitude and athletic excellence have caused him to be repeatedly invited to represent the United States in international competitions. He fights tonight to see if he will join the U.S. Olympic team in Los Angeles. I know my colleagues join me in wishing San Diego's champion, David Gutierrez, the best of luck.●

TAX STATUS OF SPACE ACT

HON. HERBERT H. BATEMAN

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, the prospect of the commercialization of space cannot fail to excite nearly anyone who contemplates it. We are only beginning to see the benefits that will come from free enterprise making use of microgravity, vacuum, and other unique characteristics of the space environment. Already, the first steps are being taken to produce drugs in space that will treat major illness such as diabetes and cancer; and to produce crystals to make the next generation of computer chips that will ensure this country's continued leadership in the electronic data processing industry. Many other activities are planned, and there will be others we cannot even imagine at this point.

I do not believe that any Member of this body would want to stand in the way of space commercialization. However, as companies have explored the possibilities inherent in space, they have discovered a significant legal obstacle. Because the tax and tariff laws have been written without space commercialization in mind, space becomes treated in such laws as if it were a foreign country. As the law stands now, U.S. companies will be denied the benefit of provisions of the tax law such as the investment tax credit and the research and development tax credit, merely because their activities would take place in space, rather than on the ground. Under present law, products manufactured in space by U.S. firms might even be subject to import tariffs when they are returned to Earth.

To remedy this situation, I am today introducing together with the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. AKAKA], the Tax Status of Space Act. This bill provides, very simply, that for the purposes of our tax and tariff laws, activities of U.S. companies in space, and products made there shall be treated in the same way as activities and products in the United States.

I hope that the House can expedite the passage of this bill and remove a major unintended impediment to the commercialization of space.●

INTERNATIONAL PARLIAMENTARY GROUP FOCUSES ON SOVIET HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the location and condition of Andre Sakharov remains unsubstantiated despite recent Soviet assurances that he is alive and well and remains in internal exile in the city of Gorky.

The Washington Post has taken editorial leadership in repeatedly devoting its lead editorial to the circumstances of Dr. Sakharov and the symbol that he represents to the world of Soviet repression of human rights.

Mr. Speaker, peoples throughout the world cannot understand why the Soviets continue to build detractors by cruelly persecuting their own people who are critical of some of their policies. If a system of government cannot tolerate criticism, it is obviously a system that ultimately will fail.

Perhaps enlightenment and an understanding of history will eventually catch up with the Soviet leadership. Until they do, pressure from change must come from outside.

One important effort to pressure for change is the newly formed International Parliamentary Group for Human Rights in the Soviet Union. It is a group of 400 parliamentarians from 13 free-world countries, all committed to fighting human rights abuses in the Soviet Union. I urge my colleagues to join.●

FAIR TRADE IN STEEL ACT

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 29, 1984

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my support for H.R. 5081, the Fair Trade in Steel Act of 1984.

I recently received a letter from my close friend Leonard Jed, a businessman from my home State of Maryland. Leonard expresses in a few words a strong message that my colleagues should keep in mind as we consider H.R. 5081. I wish to submit his testimony for the RECORD. Opponents to the bill would do well to heed his advice: "When a person is drowning, it is not time to talk philosophy." The American steel industry is indeed drowning in a sea of subsidized imports, and arguments about the abstract virtues of free trade do less to remedy the problems than the positive solutions found in the Fair Trade in Steel Act.

Our steelworkers are among the most industrious in the world, and our products are the highest quality available. But we cannot compete against heavily subsidized foreign manufacturers or imports dumped at below market prices. Recent studies reveal the effects of these predatory practices. As subsidized imports grow, domestic production shrinks. Last year, imports claimed nearly 23 percent of the U.S. market, and domestic steelmakers operated at less than 55 percent of capacity. Foreign governments assist our competitors with subsidies ranging from 20 percent to 40 percent, while the U.S. Government assists 200,000 unemployed American steelworkers.

H.R. 5081 would correct this by establishing quantitative limits on steel imports of 15 percent of total domestic supply. This is a reasonable quota, equaling the average import market share over the years 1979 through 1981. The quota would be in effect for the next 5 years, during which time the industry must demonstrate that it is reinvesting profits and modernizing its facilities.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to include Mr. Leonard Jed's correspondence in the RECORD for today's proceedings:

LEONARD JED CO.,
Baltimore, MD, June 26, 1984.

Congressman ROY DYSON,
38 W. Blair Avenue,
Aberdeen, MD.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DYSON: If one is not for himself who is one for?

As you probably know I am for free trade in the world but when a person is drowning it is not time to talk philosphy.

I think our basic industry steel in the United States is drowning and unless we do something quickly we are in big trouble. I hate to think of the world with our country becoming a second rate power. With our steel manufacturing capacity that is what we will become.

There is something wrong when we Americans are taxed as heavily as we are to provide safety to the rest of the world through our military power, and then those we protect because of their lower taxes and interest rates shoot us down by shipping their steel over here to put us out of business.

I know for a fact that there is no better worker in the world than an American Industrial person.

The steel industry has invested millions of dollars to make our plants competitive, yet the amount of steel being imported continues to be a problem.

I strongly urge you to help alleviate this dilemma to use your influence with the members of the House Ways and Means Committee to bring H.R. 5081 to a vote so that the entire membership of the Congress can vote and pass this urgently needed legislation.

Best personal regards,

LEONARD JED.●

SENATE—Monday, July 23, 1984

The Senate met at 12 noon and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

God, our Father, as the Senate enters the final phase of the 98th Congress, with less than 50 working days to adjournment, manifest Thy presence throughout the Capitol. When tension polarizes between legislation and election, give discernment, wisdom, and courage to the Senators to make principled, rather than political, decisions.

We praise Thee, good Lord, for the strong leadership the Senate has enjoyed throughout the 97th and 98th Congresses. We thank Thee for the 18 years of effective, efficient, productive public service Senator BAKER has given. We celebrate his integrity—his objectivity—his patience—his fairness—his courage—his balance—and his unflappability. Grant O Lord, that these final days of his leadership will be days of significant achievement which will fulfill his desires and crown his Senate years with total satisfaction. We pray in the name of Him who finished the work He entered history to do. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

THE CHAPLAIN'S PRAYER

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Chaplain as well. This might be a good time for me to quit. [Laughter.]

I doubt that I will ever do as well as I have at the hands of our good Chaplain in his remarks today. For all those who in the future may read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to see any reference to my efforts, I commend them to these words. Also, I am not sure he has convinced anybody, least of all the Lord, who sort of watches those things on His own. But I appreciate the remarks of the Chaplain.

THE NATIONAL CONVENTIONS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, we now have 3 weeks before the next great political uprising, which will be the Republican National Convention in Dallas.

Parenthetically, I still would like to find the man who set the Iowa caucuses in January and the Republican convention in Dallas in August. That has to rank among the worst bureaucratic decisions in the history of the American process.

In any event, we on this side of the aisle will trek to Dallas and celebrate the political verities, truths, and righteousness of the Republican cause, and hope we can do as good a job of behaving ourselves and producing a political extravaganza as our friends on the other side of the aisle did.

They may be surprised to know—but I doubt it—that I watched in rapt attention. I saw my friend the minority leader standing behind my former colleague, former Vice President Mondale, at that convention. I was reassured to know that he was there and was putting his firm hand of leadership on that group.

Seriously, Mr. President, I congratulate my friends on the Democratic side of the aisle and throughout the country for an extraordinary political event, one that was marked by unity and singleness of purpose—notwithstanding that the singleness of that purpose was to defeat all of us on the Republican side; I understand that and even appreciate that, and reciprocate that. But it was indeed a remarkable event and I think a highly successful convention from the standpoint of our Democratic colleagues who tested their duties and obligations so well in San Francisco.

Mr. President, I congratulate as well Vice President Mondale and Representative FERRARO on their nominations. I have often said, and I repeat, that there is no more important secular undertaking in which a public-spirited citizen can engage in politics and in the political endeavor than the nominations of the two great national political parties for President and Vice President of the United States.

In the months ahead, there will be substantial, sometimes even enthusiastic and fiery, disagreement between the nominees of these two great parties. But all of us who watch and occasionally stand back and attempt to view the political process in some perspective understand and realize that it is out of the heat of this political controversy that America has always tested her most important political ideas and concepts.

So there are no winners and losers in the electoral process in this country—only winners—because we sharpen our political instincts, we think about grand things for the future of this country, and we test and assay and evaluate the ideas that are pronounced by the candidates, by the platforms, and by the participants in the political process in the course of these next few important political months before the election in November.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in terms of our responsibility here in the next 3 weeks, I announced before we went out for the Fourth of July break and Democratic Convention that when we returned, our principal obligation, in the view of the leadership on this side, would be to attempt to complete as much of the appropriation bills and process as was possible.

The Treasury-Postal measure is here and available, and it is the hope of the leadership on this side that we will be able to proceed to that bill immediately after the formalities of the opening of the Senate are disposed of and that we can complete action on that bill as soon as reasonably possible. I do not know how long that will take. I have not yet had an opportunity to confer with the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee and others, but I anticipate that it probably will take more than just today.

After that, the other appropriations bills that are or shortly will be available, I understand, are Agriculture; District of Columbia; military construction; Transportation, when the House passes such a bill, and I hope they will do so shortly; Interior; Labor-HHS, if we receive it in time, and a general supplemental.

That is a major agenda of legislative business in the appropriations field which, by itself, could take all the time available to us before our recess for the Republican National Convention in August.

In addition to that, Mr. President, we have a vote on a motion to table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed House Concurrent Resolution 332, which my colleagues will recall was announced before we went out. The Sakharov resolution was passed by voice vote. Many Senators indicated, however, a desire to have a rollcall vote on that matter. So I anticipate that at a time that is mutually agreeable to both sides—and I will confer with the minority leader on that point—we will schedule that vote as an early item of business.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

I hope that during these 3 weeks, in addition to the various appropriations matters and the one I have just identified, we also may do RCRA, antitrust, research and development, the Grove City bill, a banking bill, a highway bill, a products liability bill, and the debt limit.

I freely confess that I do not believe we can do all of those things. We will have to see how much time is available and which ones of these items have the greatest claim to the priority.

In addition to that, it is the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to turn to the Wilkinson nomination. That we have done previously and had a good deal of debate. It is my hope that we can get that nomination behind us during this 3-week period.

Mr. President, that is a lot. But I know Senators are interested in what we may be able to do during these 3 weeks, and I thought I would at least publish my want list.

I will give a copy of this to my friend and colleague, the distinguished minority leader, for whatever use he wishes to make of it, but I will, in addition, consult with him on how we arrange the schedule beyond just the appropriations bills during these 3 weeks.

Mr. President, I do not yet know whether there will be votes today. The first day back is not a banner day for attendance, and I once again will consult with the minority leader on that.

I am prepared to ask the Senate to vote on the House Concurrent Resolution 332 matter today if that seems desirable, but, if not, we can arrange to do it tomorrow perhaps.

Mr. President, I think I have used more than my allotted time under the standing order. If so, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed as I have now proceeded for whatever time I have consumed and that the minority leader be given an equal amount of time so the two times are equal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the standing order, the Democratic leader is recognized.

THE SENATE MAJORITY LEADER

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, with regard to the distinguished majority leader to whom reference was made in the prayer by the Chaplain, we are told in Scripture that a word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver. The words that were spoken by the Chaplain were fitly spoken.

I am sure that there would not be a single Senator on this side of the aisle who in his heart would not agree fully with the Chaplain in regard to the laudatory adjectives used by him in describing our very congenial friend, the majority leader, who is always considerate of other Senators in every respect and who is always attempting to accommodate other Senators, as well as he can do so, in spite of the strictures, the circumstances, the problems in the rules and precedents, and the need to move legislation along. I shall have more to say about this on a future day.

THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader referred to the Convention.

I thought that the enthusiasm which was demonstrated especially on that last evening of the convention, with every participant there apparently holding a flag and waving the flag, was infectious. I was glad to see that convention end on such a note of enthusiasm. It was upbeat. And I was encouraged by that spirited ending.

I was concerned that there might be divisiveness. But the convention avoided that divisiveness, and in the end those who ran and failed to reach the goal assured the convention of their support, and I believe that the ticket of Mr. Mondale, the former Vice President of the United States, and Representative FERRARO, will appeal to, hopefully I would say, the majority of the voters this fall. I think it will contribute to a larger turnout of voters than we might otherwise see, which, I believe, will bode well for my party, but more importantly for the country. All of us, I am sure, have noted from time to time with concern, dissatisfaction, and discouragement, the consistently smaller number, percentagewise, of eligible voters in this country who have been going to the polls over the past 20 years.

I understand from my senior colleague, Mr. RANDOLPH, who keeps careful note of these things, that women voters in this country outnumber men voters, by 7 million or more.

Mr. RANDOLPH. More eligible women to vote in November than men who are eligible to vote.

Mr. BYRD. Women voters who are eligible to vote.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I restate what my colleague indicated, that there are between 7 and 8 million more women who have that opportunity and responsibility.

We hear often women spoken of as the minority in the country. Certainly they are not in their citizenship opportunity and responsibility.

If I might be pardoned, it carries me back. I was not at the 1984 convention, but I have attended conventions of our party at earlier times. I remember the convention of 1912 when I was there in Baltimore when we nominated Woodrow Wilson to carry our party's banner.

And just this further comment: I think that it is highly important that we understand, from all of the trappings of the convention, it is when the people look forward to the coming campaign which will be crucial and that they actually use their ballot on election day on November 6. That will be the test of both parties and the people of our country.

I am taking too long, but let us just realize that only 53.4 percent of the eligible voters of this country cast their ballots in the 1980 Presidential election, and 20 years before that in the election when John Kennedy was selected there were 63 out of every 100 who cast their ballots, those who were eligible to vote.

I think we need to pause and we need have not only the enthusiasm of this convention—and the able minority leader is correct about the spontaneity, in a word, of that final session with the American flags being carried in the convention hall—but we need to remember that in the 1984 November election the responsibility for the use of the ballot is something that is needed and necessary if America is to move forward and to be the country that we believe it is, a country of participation.

I am often so frightened, in a sense, by the fact that the 18-, 19-, and 20-year-old population of our country, having now the right and responsibility to vote, in the election that chose our present Chief Executive, President Reagan, to become the leader of our country, only 24 out of every 100 eligible to vote were at the polls on that occasion.

I thank my able minority leader and my colleague from West Virginia for permitting me to answer and to say some words that perhaps would better be used in another time.

If I may just add to the words of the Chaplain as reaffirmed by Senator BYRD, I certainly feel that in our majority leader we do have a strong and constructive leader and as the leaders work together, both of them, I think in these coming days there will be not only the opportunity but the responsibility to think in terms of the welfare of the country even more than perhaps the success of either party.

Mr. President, thank you very much.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three more minutes.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I say again to my majority leader that I appreciate his observations with respect to the convention. He is fair, as always, and objective. And he said something else that I think ought to bear some additional comment and it was that, after all is said and done, the most important secular activity we have to deal with in this country, probably, is the business of politics, not necessarily partisan, but politics in the abstract, because, after all, government at whatever level—municipal, county, State, or national—has an impact, directly or indirectly, on practically every activity of our daily lives, whether it be taxes, interest rates, the quality of the air we breathe, the quality of the water we drink, highways, airport improvements, the bag limits of those who hunt; in all of these things, if one stops to think, there is some impact by Government at some particular level, indirectly or directly, on practically every secular activity. And it is through the two great political parties that the American people make their viewpoints known with respect to their Government. It is much like, I suppose, two great arteries that go to the heart of the body politic, that heart being Government, and those two arteries being the Republican and Democratic Parties.

So although we often find ourselves engaged in a partisan way in dealing with these matters, the importance of this political system of ours and the importance of the political process both go beyond the mere partisan aspects that we sometimes find ourselves embroiled in. They go to the everyday vital things of life for every man, woman, and child in this country.

I thank the majority leader.

While I am on my feet, would it be convenient for the majority leader if we dealt now with the bill, H.R. 5490, which is to come over for the second time today, the Senate having adjourned over for the recess? Would it be possible for us to dispose of that at this point rather than wait until the close of morning business?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate H.R. 5490 for a second reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read for a second time H.R. 5490.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 5490) to clarify the application of title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, and title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I object to any further consideration of this measure at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pursuant to rule XIV, the bill will go to the calendar.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, may I proceed for 30 seconds?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would be remiss if I did not thank the distinguished minority leader for his extraordinary remarks and the senior Senator from West Virginia, as well. I am most grateful. I will not prolong this at this time except to acknowledge my great debt of gratitude to both of them.

Mr. President, I believe now there is a time for special orders, is there not?

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

SENATOR JENNINGS RANDOLPH—A REMARKABLE SENATOR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I was delighted to be on the floor when the distinguished senior Senator from West Virginia, JENNINGS RANDOLPH, admitted that he had been at the 1912 Democratic Convention—1912. That is 72 years ago. And just look at this remarkable Senator. He has not changed very much, maybe not at all, since then—1912, 72 years ago.

JENNINGS, I love you. I think you are a marvelous Senator. It is great to serve with you. You have contributed a great deal to this body and every day I see you, it is an inspiration. I hope that all of us have an opportunity to live somewhere near your age. You look so young, vibrant, and energetic, full of fight and fire. I wish you could be here many more years. I know you decided to retire. We are going to miss you. But to think that you were at the convention 72 years ago and you look like a million dollars right now.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Perhaps a fewer number of dollars. Will the Senator yield for a comment?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Of course.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thought that the matters discussed by the able leaders were very important in the participation of both men and women.

I would add, not strictly in a partisan vein, but I recall here in 1933 on this Hill those happenings in the first Franklin Delano Roosevelt administration. I was a Member of the House in that first 100 days. As we spoke of women participating in the dialog of our national life and one woman now being nominated for the Vice Presidency, I just recall that the first nomination that President Roosevelt suggested and requested was that Frances Perkins—a woman—to become the Secretary of Labor of the United States. And that was in 1933. Of course, she was a very, very aggressive and a very worthwhile Secretary of Labor.

I think it is important for us to know that that was a point at which perhaps Franklin Roosevelt, as well as others, begin to think of the contributions that women could make to the body politics. And, incidentally, Miss Perkins served all the years—all the years—that Franklin Roosevelt occupied the White House.

I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank my friend from West Virginia. Frances Perkins was a remarkably fine Secretary of Labor and very fine member of the Cabinet.

REAGAN ADMINISTRATION MOVES TO STOP NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, 11 Western countries that supply nuclear technology to other countries met in Luxembourg on July 11, 12, and 13. These countries decided to strengthen controls on nuclear technology to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons.

Now, I have criticized President Reagan frequently on the floor, especially on the nuclear issue. But I must say, to the credit of President Reagan. This meeting was convened on the initiative of his administration and of the President. This meeting marks another shift by the Reagan administration away from its original view that export controls offended allies that wanted to sell nuclear technology to other nations friendly to the United States. President Reagan first spoke up on the problem of nuclear proliferation at the international economic meeting at Williamsburg 1 year ago. And it is very good to have his voice and his influence directed against nuclear proliferation and I certainly want to congratulate him on this action.

In a story in the New York Times on July 16, Leslie Gelb reports three reasons why the administration has, at last, come down on the side of an international effort to reduce the proliferation of nuclear weapons: First, Brazil and China have become nuclear technology suppliers. Second, countries that could build up nuclear arsenals have successfully evaded the proscribed list of sensitive technology by buying components, subcomponents, and dual use technology. Third, Pakistan and other countries seem to be moving toward nuclear arms capability.

Of the 15 members of the nuclear suppliers club 11—all of the Western-member countries were invited. These included Belgium, Canada, France, West Germany, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland, Britain, and the United States. Australia also attended as an observer. Four other members of the suppliers club were expected to be brought into later meetings, but were excluded from the Luxembourg meeting. The countries were the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, and Poland. In total the countries listed constitute the members of the so-called London Suppliers Club. It last met in September 1977. At that time it set guidelines for nuclear transfers and a list of equipment, technology, and materials that were regarded as specially sensitive.

Mr. President, this meeting designed to bring up to date a comprehensive program for reducing the dangers of the spread of nuclear weapons deserves full and enthusiastic congressional support. This U.S. Senate earlier this year showed its deep concern about nuclear proliferation by adopting an amendment to the Export Control Act that would require an affirmative vote of both the House and the Senate for any agreement between our country and any foreign country involving the transfer of nuclear technology. That amendment passed by an overwhelming 74-to-16 vote. The Export Administration Act and that amendment are pending in a conference between the House and Senate.

Mr. President, this increasing concern about the spread of nuclear weapons makes eminent good sense. If a nuclear war comes, the chances are overwhelming it will come not from a bolt from the blue, a planned, premeditated attack by one of the superpowers. The fact is that nuclear deterrence works on both superpowers to prevent such an action. If the Soviet Union should initiate such an attack on this country, no matter how grievously and terribly that attack wounded our country, the Soviet Union knows that it would suffer a retaliatory attack that would utterly destroy Russia as an organized society. A nuclear war between the superpowers would write "finis" to civilization and possibly to the human species. Exactly for this reason the odds are overwhelming that it will not take place. On the other hand, with the spread of nuclear weapons, a nuclear war could and almost certainly eventually would break out as somewhere, sometime, some nuclear armed country decided to annihilate an adversary that had few or no nuclear arms. Of course, to prevent such annihilation all countries might rush to develop their own deterrent, creating an international situation like a fireworks party at a gasoline tank farm.

This Senator has been consistently critical of the administration for a long, long time on the nuclear arms control issue, and especially with respect to the administration's failure to recognize and act on the dangerous threat of nuclear proliferation. Now the administration recognizes this danger. It has begun to act on this recognition. For that reason I commend the administration on the Luxembourg conference, and particularly on the conclusion of that conference that more such meetings would be held, including all of the "suppliers' club" nations and that it would pursue its purpose of stopping the international spread of nuclear weapons.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Leslie Gelb from the July 16 New York Times headlined: "Nuclear Nations Agree To Tighten Export Controls" be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NUCLEAR NATIONS AGREE TO TIGHTEN EXPORT CONTROLS

UNITED STATES SOUGHT MEETING ON WAYS TO HALT SPREAD OF WEAPONS—SOVIET IS EXCLUDED

(By Leslie H. Gelb)

WASHINGTON, July 15.—Western countries that supply nuclear technology met in Luxembourg last week and decided to strengthen controls on nuclear exports, according to Administration officials.

The officials said the suppliers agreed they had to do more—expanding safeguards on existing plants, pressing new suppliers to tighten sales and controlling transfers of components—to prevent the spread of the ability to build nuclear weapons.

The meeting, arranged at the initiative of the Reagan Administration, began on Wednesday and concluded on Friday.

MEETING KEPT SECRET

The participants decided to keep the meeting secret to avoid charges, as one Administration official put it, "of the big guys ganging up on the little ones" to dictate terms for nuclear cooperation.

The Luxembourg gathering was the first meeting of most of the 15 members of the so-called London Suppliers Club since 1977. The fact they were willing to meet despite continued sensitivities of nations buying nuclear technology reflects, according to Administration officials, the heightened political concern over the problem of the spread of nuclear weapons.

CONCERN OVER PAKISTAN AND LIBYA

The Soviet Union and other Eastern European members of the club, which first met in 1974, were not invited. Officials said Western participants wanted to forge a common position first.

Of immediate concern to the participants, officials said, was Pakistan's growing ability in the nuclear field and indications that Belgium is preparing to provide Libya with nuclear training and technology.

The push of the meeting also signals the increasing influence within the Administration of those who want a tougher policy against the spread of nuclear weapons as against those who favor United States development and sales of commercial nuclear power and fuel.

Administration policy in this area has been regularly attacked as inadequate by the Nuclear Control Institute and other like-minded organizations. They issued a report last week maintaining that while more safeguards and exports controls are important, they are not enough. They called for renouncing the production and use of weapon-grade plutonium and uranium and reduced reliance on nuclear power.

Of the Luxembourg meeting, an Administration official said, "We are very encouraged by the seriousness of the discussions, the willingness to do follow-on work by specific countries, and the commitment to have another session."

Officials also said there was not a lot of the usual haggling over the need to be reliable nuclear suppliers in order not to jeopardize business interests. This seems to stem from both greater sensitivity toward the spread of nuclear weapons and decreasing interest in nuclear power as an energy source.

Of the original 15 members of the London Suppliers Club, 11 attended. They were Belgium, Canada, France, West Germany, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland, Britain, and the United States. Australia, which had been an observer, was added.

SOVIET BLOC NOT INVITED

By mutual agreement, the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, East Germany and Poland—all members of the club—were not invited. The Soviet Union has traditionally taken a stance against the spread of nuclear weapons at least as tough as the United States.

The United States delegation was led by Richard T. Kennedy, Ambassador at Large, who is special adviser to the Secretary of State on policy concerning the spread of nuclear weapons. But officials generally credited the National Security Council staff for the ideas and initiative.

The London Suppliers Club last met in September 1977 and prepared a set of guidelines for nuclear transfers and a list of equipment, technology and materials to be governed with special care.

Afterward, the Carter Administration essentially held only two-way meetings or small meetings of suppliers, a practice continued by the Reagan Administration.

NEW PROBLEMS ARISING

Officials said, however, that a general meeting seemed appropriate because of a growing realization among suppliers that new common problems were developing.

First, new countries such as Brazil and China have become suppliers. Discussions in Luxembourg dealt with how to approach them.

Second, countries with a potential for nuclear weapons have been able to circumvent existing guidelines and the lists of sensitive technology by buying components, subcomponents and dual-use technology for the production of weapon-grade nuclear material. These are far harder to keep track of than whole plants for nuclear enrichment and reprocessing of nuclear fuel.

Third, the continued movement of countries such as Pakistan toward a nuclear-weapon ability reinforced the need to strengthen and expand safeguard on existing nuclear facilities.

CHINA SAID TO HELP PAKISTAN

The Administration is particularly worried about intelligence reports of continued Chinese cooperation with Pakistan in the development of centrifuges to enrich uranium for nuclear weapons. Pakistan asserts that its facility is for peaceful purposes. The Administration signed a nuclear cooperation pact with Pakistan that officials said was still in abeyance pending clarification of this issue.

Until President Reagan's speech a year ago at the economic meeting in Williamsburg, Va., policy on the spread of nuclear weapons was not a top Administration priority. To critics of the Administration, Mr. Reagan seemed more interested in selling nuclear power plants abroad than in curbing the spread of weapons abilities.

Many senior Reagan Administration officials had been highly critical of the Carter Administration's policy. They contended that Mr. Carter placed too much emphasis on export controls and had thereby damaged relations with important allies who wanted to sell nuclear power plants and friends who wanted to buy them.

The Reagan officials wanted to dissuade potential nuclear-weapons countries another way. Their idea was for the United States to offer political incentives and a stronger United States military posture to prospective buyers and to establish the Administration as a reliable supplier of nuclear fuel.

FCIC WINS JULY GOLDEN FLEECE AWARD

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am giving my Golden Fleece of the Month Award for July to the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation [FCIC] for spending almost $12 million of Federal funds on an advertising campaign that produced no positive results. The purpose of this lavish expenditure of millions of taxpayer dollars was to increase awareness of the Federal crop insurance program and persuade farmers that it is a good investment. But farmers ended up knowing no more about this program after the ad campaign that they did before. Here is an example of Federal spending that was not proper, came a cropper, and turned out to be a whopper.

As my colleagues know, I award the Golden Fleece monthly for the most wasteful, ridiculous, or ironic use of the taxpayers' money.

The main mission of the FCIC, an agency of the U.S. Department of Agriculture that was created in 1938, is to improve the economic stability of agriculture through a sound system of crop insurance. In 1983, the U.S. General Accounting Office [GAO] investigated various aspects of the FCIC's crop insurance program. One of the objectives of this probe was to obtain information on FCIC's marketing activities.

The FCIC spent $11.9 million from fiscal year 1981 to 1983 for the purpose of advertising the crop insurance program. According to the GAO report released earlier this year, these FCIC efforts to inform farmers about the new crop insurance program—the result of the Federal Crop Insurance Act of 1980, which removed many of the prior limitations that restricted the program's growth—included the following:

. . . direct mailings to millions of producers of crops covered by the farmers disaster program and to FCIC policyholders; national and local news releases; feature stories in national magazines; an advertising program in major farm magazines, including most state publications, backed by a radio campaign; publication of several brochures; and formal training programs for independent agents, insurance company officials, and FCIC employees.

The FCIC hired a private advertising firm to carry out most of these marketing activities. And in 1983, the FCIC commissioned that same advertising firm to conduct a study of pre- and post-advertising awareness and attitudes toward Federal crop insurance.

What were the results of this study? In other words, just how effective was the FCIC-funded ad campaign? Here is the sad conclusion of the GAO investigators:

In surveying producers, the firm found that their awareness of the federal crop insurance program was about the same before and after the 1983 advertising campaign. The Manager, FCIC, concurred that the 1983 advertising campaign had a negligible effect on producer awareness of the program.

To add insult to injury, the FCIC is also spending an additional $1.6 million on this ad campaign in crop year 1984. I have never seen a better—or, should I say, worse—example of beating a dead horse.

So there it is, plain and simple. The FCIC's attempt to promote its crop insurance program did not amount to a hill of beans. Whether the ad campaign was just too corny to work, I cannot say. But I am certain that expenditures like this run against the grain of most taxpayers. In the future, I hope that the bureaucrats at the FCIC can separate the wheat from the chaff when it comes to deciding how best to spend Federal funds. For failing to do so this time around, that agency "oat to"—and does—receive this month's Golden Fleece Award.

THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION: A NEGLECTED U.S. PRINCIPLE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, recently a reception was given in honor of my distinguished colleague PAUL TSONGAS who will leave the Senate at the close of this session. I wish Senator TSONGAS the best of luck in his future endeavors and I hope that he finds as much success and satisfaction in private life as he enjoyed while serving in the Senate.

During the reception, Senator TSONGAS reflected upon his tour as a Peace Corps volunteer in Ethiopia. He was proud to be a Peace Corps volunteer not only because he was an American citizen working abroad to help the less fortunate, but also because he represented America and the values and principles it stands for.

But unfortunately, the United States has not always been viewed by many of the oppressed and indigent people of the world as a leader and vanguard for these values and principles.

Too often this has been caused by our inconsistency or lack of commitment toward human rights. One such example of this inconsistency and lack of commitment has been the Senate's failure to ratify the Genocide Convention.

Our Nation has been known in the past, and should continue to be known in the future as the champion of human rights. As a nation committed to human rights of people everywhere, we are obligated—indeed expected—to make a firm statement on the issue of genocide. Ratification of the Genocide Convention offers us the opportunity to make such a statement.

When Senator TSONGAS sponsored—and I cosponsored—Senate Joint Resolution 87, which set aside April 24 as a day of remembrance for the victims of the Armenian Genocide, it was meant to serve as more than just a testimony to the 1.5 million Armenians massacred by the Turks during World War I. That day also serves as a reminder that the United States has an obligation to do everything in its power to see that the crime of genocide is never committed again.

Mr. President, our long delay in ratifying the Genocide Convention must be baffling to our allies who look to us for leadership in the area of human rights. It is time that we eliminate this confusion and send a clear message abroad.

It is time for the Senate to ratify the Genocide Treaty.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for a period not to exceed 1 hour with statements therein limited to 10 minutes each.

SOVIET GENOCIDE IN AFGHANISTAN

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the brutal Soviet occupation of Afghanistan continues to be one of the most tragic chapters in the annals of world history. Unable to defeat the heroic Afghan freedom fighters on the battlefield, the Soviets have launched a campaign of genocide against innocent men, women, and children.

An account of one of these massacres appeared in the July 17, 1984 Washington Post. Journalist Jonathan Broder chronicles the massacre of 360 civilians in 3 Afghan villages last fall. Based upon eyewitness accounts, a terrifying portrait is painted of senseless and barbaric killings of innocent villagers whose only crime was to have lived in an area where the freedom fighters were operating.

According to the article, the killings appeared to have been committed as revenge for heavy Soviet casualties incurred after 2 days of heavy fighting with the mujaheddin.

Survivors maintained that once innocent old people, women and small children were murdered, the Soviets doused the corpses with a chemical that accelerates decomposition to a matter of hours.

One survivor described a scene in his friend's house after the Soviets had left. "Everyone was dead. Ahadar, his wife and his baby were lying on the floor covered with blood. His 9-year-old daughter was hanging over the window, half in the house, half out. It looked like she was shot as she tried to run away."

Another survivor described how even the cows, the donkeys, the cats, and dogs were shot by Russian soldiers. "Outside in the street, we found nine dead children. All were shot in the head. Some of them still had their toys in their hands."

Mr. President, once again we are greeted with another appalling news account of Soviet barbarity in Afghanistan. As the tragic costs in innocent human lives mount in Afghanistan, the freedom fighters continue their impressive resistance. The people of Afghanistan can hold their heads high and take pride in the sacrifices they make in the name of freedom. It is the Soviet Union which has sunk to the lowest level of barbarity in attempting to douse this flame of freedom. And for this they deserve the harshest condemnation of the civilized world for the genocide they are perpetrating in Afghanistan.

Mr. President, the Washington Post article of July 17, 1984, entitled "Survivors Say Soviets Massacred Civilians In Afghan Villages," is quite lengthy.

The article reads as follows:

Soviet troops killed at least 360 civilians in three villages near the southern Afghan city of Qandahar last fall, then doused the bodies with a chemical that promotes rapid decomposition, according to witnesses and survivors.

The massacre in the villages of Bala Karz, Mushkizi and Kulchabad, clustered on the outskirts of Qandahar, occurred Oct. 12 after two days of fierce fighting between Soviet troops and Moslem mujaheddin fighters.

The killings appeared to have been committed in revenge for heavy Soviet casualties, said survivors who have become refugees in this dusty Pakistani border city 140 miles south of Qandahar.

There have been repeated claims of massacres by Soviet troops since Soviet forces invaded Afghanistan in December 1979, but the stories have been difficult to confirm because of secrecy and poor communications.

Last fall western diplomats in New Delhi gave sketchy reports of large numbers of civilians killed near Qandahar. But the first details from witnesses emerged only last week after survivors crossed Afghanistan's southern border into Pakistan.

More than a dozen survivors and witnesses were interviewed through independent Pathan-speaking interpreters in hospitals and refugee camps in Pakistan.

All spoke of heavy Soviet reliance on helicopter gunships and artillery in the preliminary battles against the Afghan guerrillas. The effectiveness of such tactics and the retreat of the mujaheddin into the surrounding fields left the civilians defenseless when Soviet armored columns rumbled into the three hamlets on the morning of Oct. 12.

Survivors described in detail how the Soviets entered in tanks, armored personnel carriers and on foot, cutting down old people, women and small children where they stood. They said more villagers were lined up against walls and shot; others were gunned down in their homes.

Survivors said the Soviets doused the corpses with a chemical that accelerates decomposition to a matter of hours. They said the Soviets were aware of the widely held Afghan superstition that the bodies of mujaheddin fighters decompose more slowly than those of the enemy, thereby proving the superiority of their religious struggle.

Survivors said the three villages are deserted. Before the reported massacre, the population in each had swollen to 3,000 because of the influx of squatters from the countryside.

In reconstructing the events, Abdul Wassi, 25, an Afghan guerrilla commander, said that two days before the massacre he led 200 fighters of the Jamiat-i-Islami guerrilla group, one of six major rebel organizations in Afghanistan, in a successful ambush against a Soviet armored column about four miles northeast of the three villages.

The next afternoon, on Oct. 11, Wassi said, he learned that about 500 Soviet soldiers had regrouped and were moving with about 50 tanks and 50 armored personnel carriers toward the Khalki bridge intersection, which commands the western approach to the hamlets.

"We fought them at the bridge for several hours," Wassi said. "Then . . . we retreated to the orchards and fields around the villages after sundown and from there staged hit-and-run attacks against the Soviets during the night."

Survivors said the people of Bala Karz, Mushkizi and Kulchabad could hear the fighting in the orchards that dot the slopes about two miles from the villages. But they said it was not until dawn on Oct. 12, when a few guerrillas managed to slip back into the hamlets, that some people learned that Soviet and Afghan Army troops were about to enter the villages. Some villagers fled to the surrounding fields, survivors said, but many awoke that morning not knowing of the danger.

In Bala Karz, Gul Bebe, a widow in her 40s with four children, said she awoke early that day to lend a hand at a village wedding. She said she was visiting the groom's house when she heard shooting and explosions in Mushkizi, 300 yards down the road.

"I started to run home to fetch my children," she said. "A dozen women came running toward me and said the Russians had entered Mushkizi and killed many people. We began to run the other way, toward Kulchabad, when another group of women came running from that direction, warning us to turn back because the Russians had entered Kulchabad from that side. So we ran into the nearest house."

Gul Bebe said the 25 women watched from the windows as 50 Soviet soldiers appeared suddenly on the street, firing wildly and then fanning out to conduct house-to-house searches. One of the soldiers kicked open their door, and 10 Soviets entered the house, she said.

"The first thing the Russians did was start looking for food," Gul Bebe said. "They found some bread and began stuffing it into their mouths. They were very hungry. . . . Then they ordered us outside to another house."

Inside the second house, Gul Bebe said, they joined five other women. She said the Soviets began taking their jewelry and money.

"We told them to take everything but don't touch us," she said. At that point, Gul Bebe added, a few Afghan Army soldiers entered the house.

Lowering her voice in shame, Gul Bebe then said, "There was an attempt on us. A few Russians took two girls, about 15 or 16 years old, and separated them from the rest of us. They tried to remove their chadors [full-length Moslem veils].

"One of the old women took out some money she was hiding in her dress and offered it to the Russians to leave the girls alone. The Russians took the money and kept on handling the girls and trying to tear off the front of their dresses. Then I heard an Afghan soldier shouting at the Russians in their own language. I looked at him, and he was trembling with anger.

"I was not worried about the girls anymore. I was very frightened for myself, and I was looking for a hiding place. Then I heard a long burst of gunfire, and I saw three Russians fall down. Then there was a silence, and I ran away as fast as I could. As I was running, I heard more explosions and shooting, and then I felt a hot pain in my leg. I fell into a hole and passed out."

At the same time that the Soviets were sweeping through Bala Karz, witnesses said, other units attacked Mushkizi and Kulchabad, which flank Bala Karz on the east and west.

Sardar Mohammed, 55, a Kulchabad farmer, said he was among about 30 elderly men who had gatherered in front of the Kulchabad village mosque to await the Soviets.

"We had several instances before when the mujaheddin retreated, and Russian and Afghan soldiers came in to search the village. Sometimes the old people even used to accompany them," he said. "But this time we heard shooting and explosions, and I ran to my house."

Sardar Mohammed said he reached his home just ahead of a group of Soviet soldiers who stormed into the house of Issa Jan, his neighbor.

"My daughter and I looked over the wall and saw 10 or 12 Russians and one Afghan soldier in Issa Jan's house," Sardar Mohammed said. "We could hear Issa Jan say to them, 'If you want to search, please come in.' Then the soldiers shot him."

Sardar Mohammed said his daughter fled to another neighbor's home while he hid in the house's grain bin.

"I stayed in the grainary for hours. I could hear footsteps and smashing when the Russians entered and searched the house and then left," he said. "All the time I was hiding, I could hear shooting and explosions, then silence and screaming outside."

Meanwhile, in Mushkizi, Rai Mahmad, 20, a farmer and guerrilla sympathizer, stood on the roof of his home in the morning and saw armored personnel carriers advancing over the Khalki bridge into his village.

He said he ran through the streets, shouting, "The Russians are coming!" and then dashed home, where he and his father hid in a concealed tunnel under the floor.

"When we finally came out of the tunnel, it was almost dusk. Everything was charred and burned. Then we heard wailing and cries for help and went outside. The Russians had gone. The first thing we saw was four old men lying dead in the street, and they were just the first bodies we saw."

In Kulchabad, Sardar Mohammed said, the same sudden eerie silence, punctuated by wailing, prompted him to climb out of his grain bin and walk outside. "I came out in the late afternoon and went to the house of my friend, Ahadar Mohammed," he said.

"Everyone was dead. Ahadar, his wife and his baby were lying on the floor covered with blood. His 9-year-old daughter was hanging over the window, half in the house, half out. It looked like she was shot as she tried to run away.

Sardar Mohammed said other survivors joined him as he went from house to house in Kulchabad, searching for relatives, neighbors and friends. "I saw with my own eyes 60 bodies altogether that day, and when we buried all the dead, I stopped counting after 150," he said.

Together with about 60 other fighters, a young rebel who got his family out in time, Lal Mohammed, 25, entered his village of Mushkizi to find Rai Mahmad, his father and other survivors dragging corpses into the center square.

"We went from house to house and found everyone dead. Even the animals—the cows, the donkeys, the cats and dogs—were shot dead," he said. "Outside in the street, we found nine dead children. All were shot in the head. Some of them still had their toys in their hands."

Meanwhile, in Bala Karz, Gul Bebe regained consciousness at the bottom of a 3-foot-deep ground oven, unable to move her right leg where a bullet had shattered her shin.

"The first thing I heard was a small baby crying," she said. "After a while, I heard footsteps above and shouted for help. The person who took me out of the oven was my husband's cousin. He put me down in the middle of the courtyard and wrapped his turban around my leg.

"I looked around the courtyard and saw many bodies of dead women and children and old people lying there. My husband's cousin went over and picked up the baby, which was trying to suck the breast of his dead mother. He carried the baby over to me and asked me to keep it until the rest of the villagers could come and identify their dead relatives.

The villagers spent the night burying the dead in a mass grave, survivors said. Sardar Mohammed said 360 victims were buried. Lal Mohammed, who also helped bury the bodies, estimated that 100 people died in Bala Karz, another 100 in Mushkizi and between 160 and 170 in Kulchabad.

The morning after the massacre, Gul Bebe said, she was wrapped in a blanket along with the infant and placed atop a camel for a 60-mile journey with armed guerrilla escorts across the desert to the Pakistani border town of Chaman, where the International Committee of the Red Cross maintains a clinic for wounded Afghans. There, Red Cross officials put them on a train to Quetta, she said.

Most of the other survivors interviewed said they remained in their villages until a few months ago to harvest their crops, then moved to Qandahar to join relatives. But on June 28, the survivors said, Soviet warplanes heavily bombed the guerrilla-controlled quarter of Qandahar, killing at least 200 people.

Sardar Mohammed, Rai Mahmad, Abdul Wassi and their families were among those who crossed into Pakistan last week after the Qandahar bombing, according to records of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees in Pakistan.

IMPORT RELIEF FOR THE FOOTWEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator DANFORTH in sponsoring, S. 2845. Amending section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974 is an important part of the effort to provide import relief for the U.S. footwear industry.

This bill is necessary because of the International Trade Commission's rejection of the domestic shoe industry's request for a 5-year period of import relief. I continue to believe that the ITC failed to follow the intent of the law in failing to find injury in this case, and that shoe workers of America will suffer the consequences of this mistake.

The footwear industry is exactly the type of industry that deserves import relief under section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974. In fact, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee at the time that bill was drafted, Senator LONG, stated that in his opinion the footwear industry would win 90 out of 100 cases brought under the new section 201.

Circumstances have not changed very much since 1974. If anything, the condition of shoe workers and the communities in which they live has deteriorated. Since the orderly marketing agreements were terminated by President Reagan in 1981, imports have surged from 50 percent of the market to almost 75 percent. Accompanying this import surge have been declines in production and employment in the U.S. industry. Several efforts that the industry is prepared to undertake to improve its competitiveness have been thwarted by the unprecedented level of import penetration. Temporary import quotas would give the industry the breathing space to adjust to import competiton that is intended in section 201.

Incredibly, the ITC found no serious injury from foreign imports. Thus, changes in section 201 are necessary. It is important to note that these changes do not alter the congressional intent behind section 201, they merely clarify congressional intent.

For example, the ITC apparently relied heavily on the profitability of a few large domestic producers in its finding of no injury. The bill clarifies that the commission should consider not just profits but other indicators of injury as well. Also, the ITC apparently felt that the significant number of foreign shoes imported by domestic manufacturers argued against a finding of injury. The bill recognizes that imports by domestic producers can be a significant cause of injury. Furthermore, the bill requires the ITC to take full account of the impact of plant closings on the standard indicators of injury.

These and the other changes made by the bill would not guarantee import relief for the footwear industry. The industry would still have to file a petition and prove its case before the ITC. But the bill would clarify the conditions under which Congress expects the ITC to find injury.

Because I believe that the shoe industry deserves relief, I also support S. 2731, the American Footwear Act, which was introduced by Senator COHEN and myself, that bill would impose quotas on imported shoes for a 5-year period. The quotas would limit imports to 50 percent of the market, the level that imports had when the OMA's were lifted in 1981.

I congratulate Senator DANFORTH for his leadership in proposing reforms in section 201. I look forward to working with him and other members of the Finance Committee's International Trade Subcommittee to secure quick action on these bills.

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, last week while the Senate was out of session, the United States observed Captive Nations Week for the 26th year. I myself was privileged to participate in one of these observances in Chicago.

It is fitting that this national expression of concern for the millions of peoples suppressed by Communist tyranny should follow so closely the Fourth of July when we celebrate with gratitude the freedoms which are the foundations of our national life.

The nations of Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Ukraine, and Bielarus, held captive by the Soviet Union, this year face a new hardship. Beginning August 1, the Soviet authorities will no longer transmit prepaid insured packages sent from abroad by friends and relatives. This is just one more way in which the Soviet authorities seek to isolate the population from foreign contact and, of course, it means additional expense and hardship for people who can ill afford it.

But the people of the captive nations have amply demonstrated over the years that it is beyond Soviet power to fully isolate them. They have, at great cost, preserved their national identities against all odds. Today I want once again to pay tribute to them for their indomitable spirit and to their relatives who now live in the United States and who contribute so much to the preservation and vitality of their national heritage.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL ON ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT—PM 156

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of June 29, 1984, the Secretary of the Senate, on July 11, 1984, during the adjournment of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit to the Congress the Fourteenth Annual Report of the Council on Environmental Quality.

I have long believed that our Nation has a God-given responsibility to preserve and protect our natural resource heritage. Our physical health, our social happiness, and our economic well-being will be sustained only to the extent that we act as thoughtful stewards of our abundant natural resources.

As this report describes in detail, we are continuing to make demonstrable progress protecting and improving the quality of the Nation's air, land, and water resources. By almost any measure the air is cleaner now than it was when the Clean Air Act was passed in 1970. Since the passage of the Clean Water Act in 1972, the volume of industrial pollutants released into lakes, rivers, and estuaries has declined sharply. In spite of economic and population growth over the past decade, water quality has remained the same or improved in virtually all United States rivers.

Our Nation is justifiably proud of this record. Since 1970, we have passed comprehensive environmental legislation that is a model for the rest of the world. We have shown people everywhere that we have the environmental awareness, the political will, and the technical understanding necessary to resolve the resource use conflicts that arise inevitably in a populous, highly industrialized nation.

But our past success should not blind us to the fact that in the future we will face even more complex questions regarding the use of our natural resources. Chemicals, both old and new, will continue to be invaluable aids in our economic development, but the benefits they bestow on all of us will have to be balanced against any possible adverse health effects caused by exposure to such chemicals. Population growth, economic expansion, and the development of new kinds of industries will intensify the competing demands on our natural resources.

In the future, we will improve our stewardship of the Nation's wealth of natural resources if we apply well the lessons of the past. We have learned that scientific understanding is essential to any successful regulatory program, but that when scientists are unsure, politicians should act with caution. We have learned that regulatory actions can be effective when they are clearly defined and strongly enforced, but that without careful attention to relative benefits and costs, they can waste one resource while preserving another. Most important of all, we have learned that the Federal Government has played an important role in protecting and preserving natural resources, but that it has not acted and should not act alone. In the past, State and local governments, businesses, and private citizens all have made important contributions to environmental research, land preservation, habitat protection, and enhancement of environmental quality. If we are to continue the progress we have seen in the past, the partnership between government, businesses, and private citizens must be expanded in the future.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES SUBMITTED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of June 29, 1984, the following reports of committees were submitted on July 17, 1984:

By Mr. ROTH, from the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

Special Report of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations (Rept. No. 98-548).

PROFILE OF ORGANIZED CRIME: MID-ATLANTIC REGION

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations has issued its report on public hearings on organized criminal activity in the mid-Atlantic States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware and adjacent areas.

Most of the preliminary inquiry leading to the February 1983 hearings was conducted by the subcommittee's minority staff under my direction and in coordination and cooperation with the majority staff under Chairman ROTH, who filed the report today.

One of the key issues examined in the hearings was information indicating that imprisoned organized crime figures are often able to manage the affairs of their criminal organizations from their jail cells. This is a serious problem and can be solved, in part, by insuring that early release is denied convicts whose prison sentences are tainted by continued association with gang elements in illicit pursuits on the outside.

When police know an incarcerated organized crime leader is directing the activities of his gang from his prison cell, the warden and parole authorities should be informed and the convict should be required to serve every day of his sentence with no possibility of early release.

It makes no sense to give time off for good behavior to a convict because he seems to be a model prisoner by the usual standards of prison conduct—when, in reality, he has been running the affairs of his gang on the outside.

Law enforcement agents are so convinced that certain imprisoned crime leaders are still playing a dominant role in their gang's activities that they talk about it in a matter-of-fact, routine manner. Unfortunately, they are not required to talk about it to wardens and parole boards. Instead, there should be a procedure whereby law enforcement authorities convey this information to prison officers and parole authorities. The principle of early release is based on the assumption that the prisoner has learned that crime is wrong and that he now wants to start a new life for himself. The criminal justice system makes a mockery of that principle by giving parole to a convict whose position as a crime gang leader continued during his prison sentence.

In another finding, the subcommittee urges the Internal Revenue Service to continue its recent efforts to expand its undercover operations and move toward centralized intelligence gathering as part of a stepped-up campaign against major drug dealers and other organized crime figures as well as promoters of phony tax shelters. In the past, the subcommittee had criticized the IRS policy, adopted a decade ago in the wake of Watergate revelations, to dismantle its undercover investigative work against organized crime and major drug trafficking syndicates. "It is a waste of valuable resources to allow the IRS to remain on the sidelines in any concerted effort to immobilize criminal syndicates," the subcommittee report says, adding that some of the most notorious gangsters ever brought to justice—including Al Capone, Frank Costello, Joseph (Doc) Stacher and Leroy (Nicky) Barnes—were convicted on the basis of tax information. "Even major crime figures are required to pay income tax," the report says. "When they don't, they can and should go to jail."

The subcommittee report also recommends that the Justice Department expand its definition of what constitutes organized crime beyond the Department's principal focus of Italian-American crime families and their so-called associates. Pointing out that the Federal Organized Crime Strike Force Program in the Justice Department "for too long . . . (has) addressed the subject of organized crime as if the problem were limited almost exclusively to La Cosa Nostra" families, the report goes on to say:

> Shorly before the Subcommittee's February (1983) hearings began, two of the nation's most notorious organized crime figures died, one by natural causes, the other in a gangland-style execution. Meyer Lansky of Miami and Allen Dorfman of Chicago were not inducted members of LCN. To dismiss them as LCN "associates" is to diminish falsely their pre-eminent positions in major syndicated criminal activity. They were important mob figures in their own right. They were part of criminal associations that sometimes included LCN members and sometimes did not. By the same token, outlaw motorcycle gangs (and other non-LCN gangs) qualify as organized crime groups. As a matter of policy and procedure, they should be of appropriate interest to the strike forces. A continued preoccupation with only one group-La Cosa Nostra—neglects the very real existence of other organized criminal associations.

A fourth subcommittee finding is that law enforcement should reevalu-ate its conventional system for measuring success against organized crime. Current evaluation practices place too much emphasis upon statistics and not enough stress on the impact of police work upon dismantling criminal syndicates, the subcommittee report says. In narcotics enforcement, for example, numbers of arrests and convictions and amount of drugs seized are statistics that do not reveal the extent to which a criminal gang has been immobilized by police. A drug seizure of hundreds of pounds of heroin may have little impact on the heroin traffic if the syndicate that imports and distributes the drug is not disrupted, the report says, explaining,

A massive federal law enforcement investigation of a major drug syndicate might result in the complete immobilization of that criminal organization. However, statistics from that inquiry might not seem very impressive since only four violators were arrested and no drugs seized. By traditional statistically weighted measuring devices, the law enforcement entities involved might not be adjudged to have been effective in terms of resources expended. But, according to a new system of measuring success, the exercise could be described not in terms of arrests and seizures data, but in terms of the size of the syndicate and the amount of drugs it was importing and distributing. Seen in these terms, the case might be characterized as very important. With this system of measure, the public and the Congress could assess police effectiveness with more precision.

In other findings, the subcommittee recommends:

House passage of the Senate-passed Labor-Management Racketeering Act, legislation which I introduced with Senators CHILES, ROTH, RUDMAN and others. The bill would extend from 5 years to 10 the amount of time certain union and management officials would be precluded from serving in their offices after conviction of certain serious criminal violations. The measure would also require the convicted official to give up his position immediately upon being sentenced. Current law enables the officer to keep his job until his appeals are exhausted.

That Congress consider giving Labor Department agents investigating organized crime's role in labor-management racketeering Federal law enforcement status so that they can carry firearms, make arrests and execute warrants. Senator Hatch and I have introduce a bill, S. 2090, which would give those agents that authority. The bill is currently awaiting hearings by the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee. The subcommittee recommends that those hearings be held promptly, given the importance of this issue to the enforcement of our labor laws.

An increased commitment of Federal law enforcement resources to Atlantic City. Legalized casino gambling has brought an increase of organized crime to Atlantic City, the report says, pointing out, "A strong Federal presence . . . is called for."●

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. SPECTER:

S. 2854. A bill to establish standards governing the preventive detention of juveniles; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JUVENILE PREVENTIVE DETENTION STANDARDS ACT

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill, entitled the Juvenile Preventive Detention Standards Act, to ensure that decisions to detain juveniles are guided by clearly defined legal standards in light of the decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Schall against Martin.

The issue of preventive detention is one which has been considered extensively in the criminal law field and has been debated extensively on the floor of the U.S. Senate in a variety of contexts.

The presumption of innocence, one of the most fundamental protections in the criminal law, customarily requires that those charged with crime be admitted to bail prior to the determination of guilt.

There are, under some circumstances, necessary reasons where that standard should be altered in cases where there are habitual criminals with demonstrated tendency where release subjects the community to a high risk of repeat crime. Those standards have been established in the omnibus crime bill passed by this body earlier this year.

While there may be some question as to whether those cases should come to trial within 60 days as opposed to 90 days, I believe that there is a considerable consensus that under some circumstances pretrial detention is necessary and preventive detention is necessary.

When the issue arises as to the preventive detention of juveniles, very exacting standards must be met, in my judgment.

The distinguished groups which have studied the question of pretrial detention of juveniles have articulated standards substantially different than those which have been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States in Schall against Martin, and it is the direction of this bill to define such standards in a way which will protect the rights of the community and at the same time protect the rights of the juveniles.

The detention of juveniles prior to adjudication or disposition of their cases is one of the most serious problems in the administration of juvenile justice. Some experts estimate that up to 1 million juveniles are detained each year. Many of these youths are held under harsh conditions at a high cost to themselves and the taxpayers. As a result of being detained, many experience a variety of harmful and lasting psychological effects.

On June 19, 1984, the Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice, which I chair, held hearings to examine preventive detention of juveniles. Many witnesses testified about the need to ensure that decisions about pretrial detention are guided by clearly enumerated standards. This sentiment was expressed by, among others, the distinguished jurist, Judge Margaret Driscoll, former chairperson of the Subcommittee on Standards of the National Advisory Committee for Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. Judge Driscoll pointed to the enormous potential for arbitrariness and unfairness if judges are not provided with criteria by which to make pretrial detention decisions. These decisions are often based on extremely limited information and frequently are made after only a few minutes of deliberation. Under such circumstances, the welfare of juveniles may be seriously imperiled.

The costs of detaining juveniles can be exceedingly high. Based on my experience as district attorney of Philadelphia, and as chairman of the Juvenile Justice Subcommittee, I am convinced that detained minors often sustain very serious impact from such incarceration. Juvenile detainees are stigmatized. Indeed, as Justice Marshall noted in Schall against Martin:

> "The impressionability of juveniles may make the experience of incarceration more injurious to them than to adults: all too quickly juveniles subjected to preventive detention come to see society at large as hostile and oppressive and to regard themselves as irremediably "delinquent."

Given these problems resulting from potentially wrong detention of juveniles and given the risks of arbitrariness absent meaningful standards, it is important to ensure that pretrial detention procedures be conducted according to predetermined legal criteria. This bill will accomplish this end.

The bill stipulates that any State in which State or local law enforcement programs receive Federal financial assistance, including aid received pursuant to the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act or any other provision of law, shall not detain a juvenile who has not been found guilty of an offense which would be criminal if committed by an adult, unless certain procedural requirements are met.

Under the bill, a juvenile could not be detained unless a petition for delinquency is filed within 24 hours of arrest. An adversary hearing would then be held within 24 hours of filing. The juvenile would have a right to counsel at this hearing.

Before ordering detention, the State would have to establish that the juvenile is a fugitive from another jurisdiction, an official of which has formally requested that the juvenile be placed in detention or, alternatively, that there is probable cause to believe that the juvenile has committed a serious crime of violence which in the case of an adult would be punishable by a sentence of 1 year or more and which, if proven, is likely to result in commitment to a secure detention facility.

In the latter situation, one of the three additional factors must be present to detain: First, there is a substantial probability that the juvenile would, if released, commit a serious crime of violence based upon a finding that the juvenile has a demonstrable recent record of adjudications for violent conduct resulting in physical injury to others, or second, the juvenile is an escapee from an institution or other placement facility to which he or she was sentenced under previous adjudication of criminal conduct, or third, the juvenile has a demonstrable recent record of adjudications for willful failure to appear at juvenile proceedings.

This bill also provides that a juvenile shall be detained only if no adequate less restrictive alternative is available. All decisions to detain a juvenile must be explained in a written statement by the responsible official or judge that explicitly states the reasons for rejecting any less restrictive form of release.

At every stage in the proceedings, the State would bear the burden of establishing by clear and convincing evidence any relevant facts necessary to detain a juvenile. This standard is articulated with the calculation of more than the preponderance of evidence customarily required in a civil proceeding but less than the level of proof beyond a reasonable doubt which would be necessary for conviction. Also, the bill makes clear that a juvenile who may be detained under these guidelines need not be detained. No category of alleged conduct or background in and of itself should justify a failure to exercise discretion to release or that is consistent with the interests of the community and the juvenile.

I believe this legislation represents a balanced approach to the problem of inadequate standards in preventive detention cases. While ensuring that decisionmaking will be principled, the bill leaves officials with much flexibility to evaluate individual circumstances in specific cases.

Historically, Congress has acted to protect the rights of juveniles. National legislation has played a vital role in ensuring that women, racial minorities, the elderly, and the handicapped are treated fairly in our legal system, and that, of course, applies to juveniles as well. The Juvenile Preventive Detention Standards Act also would help ensure that our Nation's young are accorded fair treatment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the proposed bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2854

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Juvenile Preventive Detention Standards Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. Part D of title II of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"JUVENILE PREVENTIVE DETENTION

"SEC. 264. (a) The Attorney General shall withhold Federal financial assistance, including payments under this Act, for the law enforcement programs of any State or local government unless the law of such State or local government provides that a juvenile who is charged with a crime but who has not been adjudicated to be guilty of committing an offense which would be criminal if committed by an adult may only be detained in a secure detention facility subject to the following conditions:

"(1) No juvenile shall be detained for the purpose of—

"(A) punishing, treating, or rehabilitating the juvenile,

"(B) allowing parents to avoid their legal responsibilities,

"(C) satisfying demands by a victim, the police, or the community,

"(D) permitting more convenient access to the juvenile, or

"(E) facilitating further interrogation or investigation.

"(2) No juvenile shall be detained unless a petition for delinquency is filed within 24 hours of arrest.

"(3) No juvenile shall be detained unless the juvenile is accorded an adversary hearing in court within 24 hours of the filing of the petition for delinquency. The hearing shall be held subject to the following requirements:

"(A) the juvenile, the parents of the juvenile, and their attorneys shall be given notice of the hearing immediately upon an intake official's decision that the juvenile will not be released prior to the hearing;

"(B) the juvenile shall be represented by an attorney and accompanied by the juvenile's parents, if they choose to attend; and

"(C) the juvenile and the attorney shall have full access to all information and records upon which a judge relies in refusing to release the juvenile from detention, or in imposing conditions of supervision.

"(4) No juvenile shall be detained unless a court of competent jurisdiction determines within 24 hours of the hearing required by paragraph (3), that there is probable cause to believe that the juvenile—

"(A) has been verified to be a fugitive from another jurisdiction, an official of which has formally requested that the juvenile be placed in detention; or

"(B) has committed a serious crime of violence which in the case of an adult would be punishable by a sentence of one year or more, and which if proven is likely to result in commitment to a secure detention facility, and one or more of the following addition factors is present:

"(i) there is a substantial probability that the juvenile would, if released, commit a serious crime of violence based upon a finding that the juvenile has a demonstrable recent record of adjudications for violent conduct resulting in physical injury to others;

"(ii) the juvenile is an escapee from an institution or other placement facility to which he or she was sentenced under previous adjudication of criminal conduct; or

"(iii) the juvenile has a demonstrable recent record of adjudications for willful failure to appear at juvenile proceedings.

"(5) No juvenile shall be detained before or after a hearing unless there is no less restrictive alternative that will reduce the risks of flight or of serious harm to the physical safety of the juvenile or others. All decisions to detain a juvenile must be explained in a written statement by the responsible official or judge that explicitly states the reasons for rejecting any less restrictive form of release.

"(6) At every stage of the proceedings the State will bear the burden of establishing by clear and convincing evidence any relevant facts necessary to detain a juvenile.

"(7) A juvenile who is excluded from mandatory release shall not automatically be detained. No single category of alleged conduct or background in and of itself shall justify a failure to exercise discretion to release.

"(b) For purposes of this section, the term 'serious crime of violence' means criminal homicide, forcible rape, mayhem, kidnapping, aggravated assault, and robbery.".

S. 2855. A bill entitled the "Papago-Sif Oidak Chuichu Area Water Settlement Act; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 2856. A bill entitled the "Gila Bend Land Exchange and Settlement Act; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPAGO-SIF OIDAK CHUICHU AREA WATER SETTLEMENT ACT AND THE GILA BEND LAND EXCHANGE AND SETTLEMENT ACT

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, today, at the request of the Papago Tribe, I am introducing legislation to resolve the water rights claims of the Chuichu area of the Sells Papago Reservation and of the Gila Bend area of the Papago Reservation. In 1982, Congress enacted legislation to resolve the water rights claims of two other Papago areas, the San Xavier Reservation and the Schuk Toak area of the Sells Reservation. That settlement was the result of many months of negotiation and compromise by a dedicated group of people representing the tribe, the major water users in and around Tucson, AZ, the State of Arizona, and the Department of the Interior. The agreement successfully resolved water claims that had been the subject of litigation for more than 7 years.

My experience with the San Xavier and the Schuk Toak settlement furthers my conviction that negotiation is far more preferable than litigation as a means of solving difficult water conflicts. I hope that our experience gained in the first Papago negotiations will be a guide as we pursue resolution of the claims of these two other Papago Reservation areas. While I believe we can improve upon and build on that experience, we have a way to go to achieve the best and most viable solution to these presently pending Papago water claims. While I am not wedded to this legislation, these bills represent vehicles for discussion on how best to resolve these critical issues.

Mr. President, at this point, I ask that the text of these two bills appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2855

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Congress has declared that it is the policy of Congress to resolve, without costly and lengthy litigation, the claims of the Papago Tribe of Arizona for water based upon failure of the United States to meet its trust responsibility to the Indian people provided reasonable settlement can be reached.

(b) The Congress hereby finds and declares that—

(1) That at the time of settlement of the Chuichu area of the Sells Papago Reservation, it was the obligation and intention of the United States to provide water and such obligation remains unfulfilled;

(2) It is likely that the United States would be held liable for its failure to provide water and for allowing ground water beneath the Chuichu area of the Sells Papago Reservation to be mined by off-reservation entities;

(3) There exists a critical situation at the Chuichu area of the Sells Papago Reservation in that there is not sufficient water to sustain a farming operation on the Communitie's domestic needs until a permanent source of water suitable for irrigation and the domestic needs on the reservation can be delivered;

(4) This Act is proposed to settle the Papago Tribe's claim for water mined from under the Chuichu area of the Sells Papago Reservation by off-reservation entities by obligating the United States to meet the Papago Tribe's needs for a permanent supply of water in this area of the reservation in a fixed amount to be available upon a date certain, in exchange for a release of all claims the Papago Tribe has against the United States for failing to act consistently with its trust responsibility to protect this water resource of the reservation; and

(5) It is the long-range interest of the United States and the Papago Tribe to reach a fair and equitable settlement of this claim of the Papago Tribe.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 19. This Act may be cited as the "Gila Bend Land Exchange and Settlement Act."

By Mr. ANDREWS (for himself, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. MCCLURE, and Mr. DIXON):

S. 2857. A bill to enable honey producers and handlers to finance a nationally coordinated research, promotion, and consumer information program designed to expand their markets for honey; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

HONEY RESEARCH, PROMOTION, AND CONSUMER INFORMATION ACT

● Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that would enable the producers and handlers of honey and honey products to finance a nationally coordinated research, promotion, and consumer information program designed to expand their markets for honey and honey products.

Mr. President, this bill will effect honey producers in every State of the Union and in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. In my home State of North Dakota, the leading honey producing State, honey producers have been hurt by an influx of cheaper imported honey. As a result, they have been forced to rely in an ever increasing fashion upon the commodity support programs of the USDA, increasing Government participation in the honey industry.

This bill should help to reverse this growing governmental dependence by creating a national marketing organization for honey producers, a task which has been all but impossible in the past owing to the fragmented nature of the industry. It is anticipated by the industry that legislation of this sort will provide them with the opportunity to launch a national program to first, research new uses for honey and honey products, second, increase consumer awareness of the nutritional quality and versatility of honey, and third, seek and develop new market for honey. All of these promotional goals will be financed by the honey industry at no cost to the Federal Treasury.

This legislation will provide the honey industry with a mechanism to solve marketing problems in a fashion similar to programs employed by the potato, egg, and cotton industries. The success of the programs in other areas are living examples of the truth of the old adage, "It pays to advertise." These groups have found that industry wide promotional efforts have created consumer awareness and marketing opportunities, increasing sales while reducing dependence upon Government-sponsored support programs.

This act does not dictate anything in the way of quality standards, or production restrictions, or in any way limit the production or marketing decisions of the individual producer. In that regard, it is a perfect example of Government guidance, not intervention.

In summary, Mr. President, this bill would authorize the establishment of an orderly procedure for the development and financing of a coordinated program designed to promote a national marketing plan for the honey industry. This act will be funded by industry participants at no cost to the Federal Government. I am confident that this legislation will provide the governmental assistance, guidance, and encouragement necessary for the honey industry to help itself achieve market stability. Certainly this self-help option is preferable to ever increasing dependence on the Federal Government.

I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this bill.●

SIGNS OF ECONOMIC EXPANSION IN NEW YORK

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, at a time when all of us look toward economic growth and expansion, I am pleased to report that Avon Products, Inc. has just opened a new administrative office complex in Rye, NY. Located in the new Rye facility are more than 450 employees comprising 5 Avon departments: information services, branch operations, manufacturing operations, controller's, and administration.

Avon is the world's leading manufacturer and distributor of cosmetics, fragrances, and fashion jewelry. Avon also holds the preeminent position among all direct-selling organizations: its products are sold by almost 1.4 million sales representatives to customers in more than 30 countries.

Among the basic principles which have guided Avon throughout almost a century of progress in New York is one that states, "We will honor the responsibilities of corporate citizenship by contributing to the well-being of the society in which we function." This they have done faithfully—both within our State and throughout the country—by actively supporting programs and organizations devoted to the alleviation of human suffering and to the improvement of the health, education and quality of life of all members of society.

Better known is Avon's commitment to provide women an opportunity to earn and achieve. More than 30 years before women had the right to vote, Avon had provided them the chance to become independent business people, by offering an easily accessible route to genuine individual development. In this century of transition and progress for women, Avon has offered millions more opportunities for earnings and personal growth than any other American company.

Inseparably linked with the Avon representatives' opportunity is the service they, in turn, provide to consumers—service renowned for its personalized attention, in-the-home convenience, and high standards of business conduct which have become synonymous with the Avon name. In an increasingly impersonal world, the Avon representative remains that rare independent business person who knows her customers by name and is well-acquainted with their needs.

The quality of Avon service is matched only by the quality of the products they sell. More than 700 scrupulously tested cosmetics, fragrances and fashion jewelry items are offered to customers, backed by a guarantee of satisfaction that is unsurpassed in today's marketplace. And the value of these products is self-evident. New Yorkers are demanding consumers, and more than three generations of them—in the millions—have continually welcomed Avon representatives and Avon products into their homes.

In addition to the new office complex in Rye, and their headquarters office in New York City, Avon also maintains a major manufacturing and research facility in Suffern, NY.

The parent corporation, Avon Products, Inc., includes three other divisons: Mallinckrodt, a leading manufacturer of health care products and specialty chemicals, with facilities in upstate New York and on Long Island; also, Foster Medical, a health services and medical supply company; and Direct Mail and Specialty Retailing, which includes Avon Fashions and Tiffany & Co.

I am pleased to recognize and commend to you Avon Products, Inc.—one of New York's outstanding corporate citizens.●

HON. JOSEPH H. BOTTUM

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, it is with great sorrow that I must inform the Senate of the death of a former Member of this body, the Honorable Joseph H. Bottum of South Dakota. Senator Bottum was appointed on July 9, 1962, to fill the term of the late Senator Francis Case, and served with distinction in the remaining days of the 87th Congress.

Joe Bottum was a great patriot and a great statesman of South Dakota. The depth of his feeling for his country and his work in its behalf prompted an editorial writer to observe that it was only fitting his death came on the Fourth of July.

To causes in which he believed, Joe Bottum gave untiring effort—our great country, the State of South Dakota, the Republican Party, the institutions which serve to preserve our freedoms—above all, his beloved family. All commanded his utmost respect, his dedicated service.

Joe Bottum believed it was absolutely essential to the future of his country to interest young people in the political process. Indeed, much of my early activity in South Dakota Republican circles stemmed from a phone call Joe made to me urging me to come to the South Dakota Young Republican convention. Joe was one of the founding fathers of that group and its first chairman. He had a way of convincing people, and JIM ABDNOR was soon greatly involved in the Young Republicans and on his way to a political career of his own.

It was my privilege to be a member of the South Dakota Senate when Joe, as South Dakota Lieutenant Governor, served as its president. He set an example of fairness and impartiality in the office of presiding officer that remains a standard today.

Joe Bottum was a great teacher of all of us in South Dakota, and his teaching came primarily from the example he set for all of us. I commend the attention of my colleagues to some of the tributes which were accorded to Joe and ask they be printed in the RECORD.

Our sympathy goes out to his beloved wife, Nellie, and their daughter, Mary Jo, together with our thanks for sharing him so generously with South Dakota and our great country.

JOSEPH BOTTUM DIES WEDNESDAY AT AGE 80

(By Gordon Hanson)

Former Circuit Judge and U.S. Sen. Joseph H. Bottum, 80, a longtime Republican Party figure from Rapid City, died Wednesday in Rapid City Regional Hospital.

He had been in failing health for about two weeks and was taken to the hospital at 3 a.m. Sunday, said a family friend.

Funeral services are pending under the direction of Behrens Mortuary.

Bottum started his career in South Dakota politics in 1934 when he was an organizer and later president of the South Dakota Young Republicans League.

He as the presiding judge of the 7th Judicial Circuit from 1969 to 1979, resigning at age 75 and joining the Rapid City law firm of Wilson, Bottum, Olson, Goodsell and Nash.

Bottum was born in Faulkton on Aug. 7, 1903, to J.H. and Sylvia Bottum. His father was judge of the 10th Judicial Circuit from 1909 to 1945.

He was a student at Yankton College and the University of Michigan before graduating from the University of South Dakota School of Law in 1927. He practiced law in St. Paul, Minn., from 1928 to 1930.

In August 1929 he married Nellie Bang. They had one daughter, Mary Jo.

Bottum returned to South Dakota in 1930 and practiced law in Faulkton. He was Faulk County state's attorney from 1933 to 1936.

He was head of the Young Republicans League from 1934 until 1942. Gov. Leslie Jensen appointed him state director of taxation in 1937, a job he filled until July 1943 when he moved to Rapid City to open a law office. In 1946 he was elected Republican state chairman.

Bottum made a strong bid for the Republican nomination for governor in 1942 when he obtained a 30 percent plurality in a four-way primary election—more than any other candidate—but lost to M.Q. Sharpe at the GOP convention. In 1950 he lost a primary race for Congress. He was the Pennington County state's attorney before being elected lieutenant governor in 1960, serving with Gov. Archie Gubbrud.

His political career took another turn in July 1962 after Sen. Francis Case died in office and Gubbrud appointed Bottum to finish the term. In November, Bottum made a bid for his own six-year Senate term, but lost by 504 votes to Democrat George McGovern.

In 1969 Bottum was appointed circuit judge in Rapid City. He was elected a four-year term on the bench in 1970 and was re-elected in 1974, outpolling the field in the race for five 7th Judicial Circuit positions.

In Rapid City, Bottum was a founder of Community Chest, a past president of the chamber of commerce and the area Boy Scout Council. He was active in the Elks. Lions and several Masonic bodies, including state honors by Scottish Rite Masons as sovereign grand inspector general of the rite in South Dakota.

Bottum campaigned extensively for Republican candidates during his career and was in demand as a public speaker. He was also a musician, a talent that helped him earn money for his college education. He was one of the organizers of the Strollers Club at the University of South Dakota and wrote the music for the first performance of the Strollers Show at USD.

His most recent honor came two weeks ago when he was named recipient of the 1984 McKusick Award from the University of South Dakota law school for outstanding contributions to the state legal profession.

In later years he became an avid jogger, surpassing the 10,000-mile mark by 1976.

Bottum was asked in a March 1981 interview if he was patriotic.

"I've always felt that way," he replied. "I was 15 when we were in World War I, so I was too young. When the next one came along I had the job in Pierre and the governor said 'Stay here," so I did. But I've always felt badly I didn't get to go with the rest of the guys.

"Patriotism? We need it. So many people are making fun of government. They say it's crooked, but most people in government are very conscientious and do a good job."

Survivors include his wife, Nellie, of Rapid City.

JOE BOTTUM WASN'T ASHAMED OF BEING PATRIOTIC

If South Dakota had a "Yankee Doodle Dandy,' it was Joe Bottum. He wasn't born on the Fourth of July but it is fitting his death came on the birthday of the country he loved.

During his long career as an attorney, politician, state and federal government official and as a judge, Bottum unashamedly expressed that love for country and his respect for its system of government in hundreds of speeches to audiences large and small.

Though public attitudes toward patriotism and nationalism fluctuated over the years with the ebb and flow of national and international events, Bottum's strong feelings about this country and what it stands for never wavered. When he expressed those feelings, even the most cynical had to be moved.

Joe Bottum was a gentleman and a gentle man. As he strolled down the street, he often took time to pat a youngster on the head. His volunteer work on behalf of the Boy Scouts earned him the Silver Beaver Award.

If anything shared a spot in Bottum's heart with his wife and daughter, and his country, it was music. Many a public and private gathering was enlivened by his piano playing and singing. Some of the songs he had written himself. For years, he played the Rapid City Shrine Club calliope in parades throughout the Black Hills. He also wrote poetry.

Years of political activity taught Bottum to accept both victory and defeat graciously and philosophically. He was also politically pragmatic. Once in commenting on the wounds of a party primary, he observed that when the campaign is over intraparty factions talk about burying the hatchet but someone usually keeps the handle hidden behind their back ready to use it when the opportunity presents itself.

Bottum set high standards for himself and expected others to respect those standards. During a trial of several American Indian Movement members charged in the 1973 Custer County Courthouse melee, Bottum twice ordered a Sioux Falls courtroom cleared of those who refused to stand when he entered the courtroom. He demanded that traditional mark of respect be observed for the judicial office and not for him personally.

Joe Bottum will be missed. Rapid City and South Dakota have benefitted from his being here.

Services for former Circuit Judge and U.S. Sen. Joseph H. Bottum, 80, Rapid City, will be 10 a.m. Saturday at the First Congregational Church with the Rev. Henry Bradshaw and the the Rev. Ned Wick officiating. Burial, with Masonic rites, will be in Pine Lawn Cemetery.

Visitation will be Friday from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. at Behrens Mortuary. Memorials have been established to the American Cancer Society and the First Congregational Church of Rapid City.

Bottum, a longtime lawyer and Republican party leader, died Wednesday at Rapid City Regional Hospital.

During a public service career in which he emphasized Americanism, patriotism and duty to God and country, Bottum received many honors, including the "Friend of Law Enforcement" award presented recently by the South Dakota Peace Officers Association and the Sertoma award for service to mankind. He was named Boss of the Year by the Junior Chamber of Commerce.

While a member of the U.S. Senate, Bottum received the Distinguished Service award from the Americans for Constitutional Action.

Survivors include his wife, Nellie of Rapid City; one daughter, Mary Jo Bruce of Phoenix, Ariz.; two grandsons and several nieces and nephews.

He was preceded in death by five sisters and one brother.

JOSEPH BOTTUM: FROM BALLROOM TO THE SENATE

(By Ron Bender)

His career has taken him from a ballroom stage in Sioux City, Iowa, to the floor of the U.S. Senate in Washington.

He's helped Republican candidates get elected since the mid-1930s, been elected several times himself, and lost a few close ones.

He's presided over hundreds of trials, including one in 1974 that resulted in a riot in Sioux Falls. His list of public service and Masonic Lodge activities covers two pages of single-spaced type. He's still one of the most sought-after speakers in western South Dakota.

And, at the age of 77, Judge Joseph Henry Bottum of Rapid City still jogs two miles every morning—and practices law. He was presiding judge of the 7th Judicial Circuit until two years ago.

"I had to quit my job when I turned 75," explained Bottum. "So I came in here (the firm of Wilson, Bottum, Olson, Goodsell and Nash). They're all young and darn good guys."

Bottum has seen his share of both good guys and bad guys during his varied career. He smiles a lot while describing the many good times, breaking into a chuckle during a yarn about a long-ago political convention. His expression is serious as he vividly recalls the few bad times in politics and the courtroom.

It might not have turned out that way had Bottum followed his first inclination—to become a dentist. "I entered dental school at the University of Michigan, but didn't care for it, so I went out and played for a dance band in northern Michigan for a year."

He had learned to play the piano and saxaphone in high school in Faulkton, while his brother, the late Roswell Bottum, played drums, xylophone and fiddle. Both brothers ended up following in the footsteps of their father, Circuit Judge J. H. Bottum, and became lawyers.

Joseph Bottum Jr. started law school in Michigan, but returned to earn his degree from the University of South Dakota in 1927. His musical talent came in handy to earn money for school.

"I joined a dance band, the University Players. We had about 12 people," recalled Bottum. The band played around southeastern South Dakota, including six weeks at the Roof Garden, a large Sioux City ballroom.

Any USD graduate is familiar with the Strollers Show, and annual musical extravaganza put on by the students. Bottum was one of the original organizers of the Strollers Club during the 1920s, and wrote the music for the first performance.

Does he still perform? "I play the piano at home, but it's not for human consumption," he smiled.

After graduation, a friend of his father helped him find a job in St. Paul, Minn. "It paid $25 a month, but I could sleep at my aunt's home. Those days they didn't pay beginning lawyers anything."

Bottum soon met an attractive school teacher, Nellie Bang, and they were married in August 1929. "She kept teaching. She was making a hell of a lot more money than I was at the time," he recalled.

The Bottums returned to South Dakota in 1930 where Bottum entered private practice in Faulkton and became state's attorney for Faulk County (for $100 a month).

In 1934 he became active in the Republican Party and was one of the organizers and later president of the South Dakota Young Republicans League.

"We had a big organizational meeting in Mitchell and it was very successful. A lot of young fellows signed up and did lots of work," he said proudly. When Leslie Jensen defeated incumbent Democratic Gov. Tom Berry in 1936, the new governor asked Bottum to become state director of taxation, a job he held until he moved to Rapid City in 1943.

That's the year after he really plunged into politics and made a run for the GOP nomination for governor, but lost narrowly to M. Q. Sharpe in party convention balloting.

"Quite a few of us ran, and I got the most votes, about 33 percent. But you had to have 35 percent to win," said Bottum. The older delegates switched their support to Sharpe, who had been attorney general, and he emerged as the convention's choice and won the 1942 general election.

In Rapid City Bottum resumed his private law practice, and served a stint as Pennington County state's attorney before being elected lieutenant governor in 1960, serving with Gov. Archie Gubbrud.

Bottum's political career took another turn in 1962 when Sen. Francis Case died in office and Gubbrud appointed Bottum to finish his term. That was in July. That November he lost a bid for his own six-year Senate term to George McGovern—by a slim 504 votes.

Bottum admits to being "very delighted" when James Abdnor beat McGovern last fall.

In 1969 Bottum was appointed circuit judge in Rapid City, succeeding Judge George Lampert who resigned because of ill health. Bottum was elected to a four-year term on the bench in 1970 and re-elected in 1974, outpolling the field in the race for five 7th Judicial Circuit positions.

"I suppose the highlight of my judicial life was that deal I had with the Indians in Sioux Falls," he said.

The scene was the Minnehaha County Courthouse April 30, 1974. Five American Indian Movement members were on trial, charged with riot and arson after a violent demonstration in Custer in 1973.

AIM spectators at Sioux Falls refused twice to stand when the judge entered the courtroom during jury selection, so Bottum ordered the courtroom cleared and went to his chambers.

"I was back in my office, waiting for the sheriff to get his deputies, when in came some of the Indians, not the ones on trial. They proceeded to tell me what an egotistical SOB I was and that they wouldn't stand up. I told them I couldn't force them to, but I could force them to leave the courtroom, and I also told them I thought their actions were hurting the defendants in the courtroom."

The Indians left and the deputies arrived and entered the courtroom. "When they stepped in the door, I heard a terrible crash. It was a chair being thrown through the window. And about when that happened, every window in my office was broken (by objects thrown from outside the courthouse)."

About $10,000 damage resulted from the wild courtroom melee, in which both deputies and demonstrators were injured. The next day Bottum rejected defense motions to dismiss the case, but decided to delay proceedings for 10 days. The trial resumed, with no more problems. The defendants were convicted and sentenced to prison.

But Bottum was accused of being racially prejudiced and was given a 24-hour guard at the urging of the FBI. He says it wasn't egotism; but his insistence on proper courtroom procedure, that prompted his action.

"Would I have done it the same way if I had known what would happen? I think I would," he said. "I've done research, and the custom of having people stand came over here from England. It was part of British customs and rules through the ages. The idea was that making everybody rise calmed the courtroom. People knew court was in session.

"I suppose we could accomplish that some other way, but I don't see any reason why we should."

It's evident in talking to him that doing the right thing has always been important in Bottum's life. To him, it translates into public service and patriotism.

"Am I patriotic? I've always felt that way. I was 15 when we were in World War. I, so I was too young. When the next one came along I had that job in Pierre and the governor said 'stay here,' so I did. But I've always felt badly I didn't get to go with the rest of the guys.

"Patriotism? We need it. So many people are making fun of government. They say it's crooked, but most people in government are very conscientious and do a good job."

Bottum's own public service list ranges from work done in various Masonic orders to service clubs, the Boy Scouts, chamber of commerce and community chest (now the United Way).

"Rapid City people, in the main, have been very receptive to good programs. I've never seen a public program fail in this town since I've been here. And it takes a lot of people to do all we do here.

"I guess that'a part of 90 percent of my talks. I talk about being a working part of your community—Boy Scouts, chamber, church, the whole thing."

It's a good thing Bottum enjoys public speaking, because he's asked to do it often.

"I've been awfully busy—God knows why—making speeches. I've had five in the last week. I just can't say no," he smiled. "But I enjoy it, and it's really nice when you make a talk and they not only clap but stand up too. That's some indication that a few people enjoyed it."

One reason Bottum can maintain a busy schedule is the physical stamina he enjoys from jogging. He started in 1967.

"I used to smoke three packs of cigarettes a day. I had a cough, a sore throat, I was overweight. About that time I quit smoking and was having a hard battle with my weight. So I saw the doc and told him I was considering taking up jogging. He said, 'Go ahead, but take it easy, and if you get tired walk a lot.' So I had no trouble losing weight then."

He passed the 10,000-mile mark in 1976 and now gets up at 6 a.m. every day, steps outside and runs two miles in his neighborhood to start his day. "It's helped keep me healthy. My blood pressure is normal and I weigh close to 170. I had been up to 212."

At 77, Bottum is starting to consider retirement. A Christmas visit to the Bottums' daughter, Mary Joe Bruce, in Arizona, got him thinking about spending more time there.

One thing keeping him in South Dakota is his position as sovereign grand inspector general for the Scottish Rite of South Dakota. "It's time-consuming," he admitted. "I have to make up my mind if I should pass it on to somebody else. Maybe I've been holding too long."

In the meantime, Black Hills author Ned Wick, a longtime friend, is writing a biography of Bottum.

"It's generally about the things I've done," said the judge. "I keep telling him nobody's going to read it, but he still insists on going to all that trouble."

"And we are sad because our friend is no longer with us and we seek his company. . . ."

Joe Bottum loved the arts . . . music, whatever . . . drama. His friends ran the gaumet from old to young; from every walk of life. He loved young people; their potential; he loved his professional life; his personal life; his family and yes, his country. In a sense the day of his passing, last Wednesday, July 4th, Independence Day was fitting for Joe . . . need anything else be said on that?

I have been asked to give some anticdotes . . . vignettes . . . on this powerful personality. We all have them; they are tucked away in our hearts and minds . . . from piano playing in honky tonks and homes to dignified sessions in Congress. However, there is one that I will share with you, known only to two of us here present; Nellie, his wife, and myself.

It happened Wednesday and if one can say that when a friend passes over and its beautiful; then the death of Joe Bottum was . . . It was just after four in the afternoon and I has just positioned a chair for Nellie at the side of the bed in order he could better see and talk to Joe; I was at the end of the bed and looked up at him . . . gazing at her. And then I realized he had gone. I excused myself to Nellie and sought a nurse; I came back before she did . . . and Nellie said, "Ned, I think he's stopped breathing." His daughter was in the waiting room and she came in on my call; the nurse confirmed it. It was beautiful; his family was there, his passing was gentle . . . and, he was a gentleman, and gentle man.

Each here could contribute a touch of Joe Bottum in a personal way . . . so, contribute now, to your thinking as we here join to reminisce.—Think of his love for mankind—his values that thrust him ever forward in this path called life.

What can we take from all this? What unites all his friends, all of us, here together?

Why Joe Bottum in our lives?

You might well ask, although many of you know, Joe and I were writing a book together . . . about him. I have been privileged to many private papers, thoughts, pictures . . . it has been a wonderful path for me . . . I've known Joe for over 40 years.

We used to kick around literature . . . selected, forgotten writings . . . even the writings we were doing. . . . He was a great thinker, orator, writer . . . as you beheld him . . . whatever. Did you recognize 2 of his songs played at the beginning of our services today? "Dakota Girl" written in the 20's for the USD Strollers and "Underneath Mt. Rushmore Moon?" . . . that was a story in itself, Allie Hand, his home, his piano.—

Henry Van Dyke once wrote:

"Four things a man must do
"If he would make his record true:
"To think without confusion clearly,
"To love his fellow-men sincerely,
"To act from honest motives purely,
"To trust in God and heaven sincerely."

Every good work should have a beginning and an end; Joe Bottum was, in some respects, an enigma: where do we start? What premise, possibility?

Examining, there is one common denominator in the life of Joe Bottum that comes through loud and clear when you examine his work: He was a teacher to all of us . . . always, all ways. Think back in your own experience with him: leading, guiding and cajoling us, to move us . . . it was his lifestyle. An he took that beautiful talen to influence all of us . . . to being a better person than we were before . . . before we knew him. Indeed, his lifestyle. We have a right to validate what a man says by his lifestyle.

I have been privileged to be an intimate part of that lifestyle, as I said, for over 40 years: from the old Beckers Drug hang-out days (remember the soda fountain, the old sub-post office station counter?), to countless miles in travel from coast to coast . . . and, to those favorite haunts. You who frequent the Alex Johnson at the appointed hour know what I mean. . . .

But, Joe Bottum was not exclusive to a group. He was a man of the people. Loving people, he was a man of the people. Always interested; always a friend.

We want to be careful not to over-emphasize the good qualities at a time like this—yet, we can be pardoned to leave the rest unsaid. What we can say is wrapped up in many of his personal writings we were putting together in a book.

We got side-tracked in our game plan . . . but that was easy to do with Joe. . . .

The hours we would share over only one sentence—all philosophical, of course—were countless.

Perhaps his career touched you personally in some way . . .?

The Custer Trial, as he called it, is a fascinating phase of his life—when, in the very critical press of pressure of the trial he returned to Rapid City for a brief visit and took Nellie to a Law Day Banquet. In his own words, he wrote to me:

"I hurried into the dining room to find a place to sit and I must say that I have never in my entire life experienced anything more exciting and thrilling than I did. When I came in the Bar, apparently by pre-arrangement, acknowledged my presence at the affair and clapped and cheered to a point where I was actually embarrassed by so much attention. Needless to say, it is very heart-warming to have someone, or a group such as this, say a word of commendation. . . ."

Peer recognition—and it was repeated by his professional colleagues many times in many ways. You have read of many of his achievements in the recent fine newspaper reviews.

To think without confusion clearly . . . remembered Henry van Dyke?

Point one. Taken.

The second point of van Dyke: To love his fellowmen sincerely. From his own writings, and I quote now:

From remarks he was asked to make at the graveside for a dear neighbor. . . . "I want to remind you on this occasion, there is sadness, of course. Sadness should be overcome by our memories of a beautiful life that surmounted hardships and disappointments—a life that gave direction and inspiration. . . . (we) carry into the future her calm serene and productive life—her honesty—her bravery, her exemplary life so that our lives will reflect what we learned from her. . . ."

From a speech he had given:

"And so, my dear friend, treasure these moments of pleasure of inspiration. Hold them close to your heart and use the inspiration to light your face, to broaden your smile. You can go on about your appointed task, be it large or small, whatever it is, it is yours, so make the most of these glorious days. . . . the future is waiting and your impression or impact upon this old earth awaits your action."

These, of course, are only excerpts that I read to you . . . but from "The Challenge of Mt. Rushmore," a published article: "Look up, America . . . These men, with millions more who saw the dream, who heard the call, who made our nation great, require your constant devotion to the cause of liberty. . . . This hertitage so ably represented by the carving on the mountain must keep us on the sacred path, alert and ready to fulfill our duty to our country and our fellow men. . . . No force, except the will of ruthless men, acting on the minds of those who have forgotten, will ever destroy the will to be free, implanted in the minds and hearts of all true Americans."

Joe was in the habit of communicating, to some of his personal friends, little notes on different occasions. Here is one I'll share with you to two of his friends:

"Here are some random thoughts on the occasion of your Golden Wedding Anniversary.

"A glint of golden sun after a rain. . . .

"No, gold is not made in a day, a year—fifty years . . .

"A Golden Wedding . . .

"For this is true gold—from it, a better home—

"Wonderful children—grandchildren . . .

"A Golden Anniversary—its golden radiance lends beauty

"And inspiration to all who join me in saying, 'A Joyous and Happy Golden Anniversary.' "

Henry van Dyke: Point Three: To act from honest motives purely; again reading from his records: In a private letter written to me concerning some points in the book writing: . . . "I don't think we should try and prove that they should live in exactly the same form we live, but that they should live as Americans with the proper following of the law of the land and with the same ambition to work and accumulate a home and a fireside, send children to school. . . . Those are things that someday must come about. . . ." From an article entitled "Practical Patriotism" A point Joe Bottum liked to make. He was not the radical patriot; he loved his country and its traditions its laws, its way of life:

"Today I will say something good about my country.

"Today I will answer any attempt to down-grade my country and its leaders.

"Today I will speak up for my country. I will try to be constructive, fair, honest. . . ."

In a speech on a special occasion day:

". . . Never cut down the things that you can do for your community and your home and your churches and your schools. That's the challenge of Memorial Day, my good friends. . . ."

Again, from random notes:

"Strength of America lies not in our armies, not in our courts, not in our law enforcement agencies, but in the hearts and minds, morals and attitudes of the average American . . ."

Point 4 of Henry van Dyke is quite clear; quite clearly Joe Bottum, as well. To trust in God and heaven sincerely. I will speak more on that shortly; however:

From a writing entitled "My Prayer"

"I thank Thee Lord for all I've had
"A pleasant life—some good, some bad.
"For triumphs over problems, big and small "For failures and defeats that left me standing tall,
"With character unsullied by defeat . . ."

And, again from other thoughts to me on vows . . . and he had taken many of them in his lifetime; his lifestyle.

"Should the day ever come when vows and pledges are taken lightly, when modern cynics lead others to scoff at Honor and Integrity, Then, the sacrifices of millions, The impulses and dreams of the masses will Fade into nothing and hope and honor will disappear from the face of the earth. Oh God in heaven, I vow to do my best for what is right, honest and good. Not for me, but for my fellow man. . . ." He went on to use that in a later speech.

To the 4 of van Dyke I would, in the case of Joe Bottum, add a fifth:

To love his family dearly—which is what he did. And, they, as you can see by representation here, did him in return . . .

And—he taught us, ever the great teacher . . . to know how important it is for a person to be so fortunate as to have a wife of 55 years such as his beloved Nellie. On the occasion of their then 51st Anniversary, he had written a letter to her (I will not read all of it . . . but enough to illustrate the love and the teacher in it):
